THE LIFE AND CAREER

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

G.C.B., P.C., D.C.L., LL.D., &c.

was usually good to conjure with, he was never without a party opposed to him, and by that party and its organs he was constantly and bitterly assailed. The most impartial mind, it was long ago remarked, can hardly avoid being biassed against Sir John Macdonald by the language of his friends, and in his favour by the language of his foes. His friends hailed him, with ecstatic admiration, as the maker of Canada and the honoured chieftain of his party; his enemies saw in him only a monster of political crime. By the henchmen of party he was esteemed an ideal leader, and there is no doubt that he possessed in a wonderful degree the gifts that attract and weld together a party following. Of recent years he had become the object of excessive party worship, a worship so idolatrous as to close the eyes of his adherents to his shortcomings and faults. This was specially manifest in the effective campaign cry of the last General Election, when "The Old Man, the Old Policy, and the Old Flag" was the enthusiasm-compelling watchword of the Tory party. By the ebb and flow of party fortune Sir John Macdonald has rarely been affected: only once has he suffered conspicuously from the withdrawal of the public favour, and even in that case public morality made haste to make amends for averting for a time its face. Temporary reverses, of course, he now and again met with, and violent at times was the rancour of those opposed to him; but he rarely had to meet opposition from within, while disaffection and rivalry were almost unknown factors in his own camp. To an extraordinary extent he could depend upon the devotion and attachment of friends, and loyalty to him and his cause was almost a fetich among his worshippers.

It would be difficult in a word or two to say what were the causes of Sir John Macdonald's success as a Canadian statesman. Not a little of the interest that attaches to his career arises from the long period over which his public life extends and his hearty sympathy with the national aspirations. To these may be added the entire and disinterested devotion, which he always evinced, to the material interests of the country, and his long-time and complete identification with its political history. Not a little is due also to his phenomenal tact and adroitness as a party leader, to his intimate knowledge of men and the world, to his faculty of winning to himself and his cause those who were ever ready to help him in need and stand by his fortunes, to that charm of manner which brought even political opponents under his personal sway, and to those arts and methods as a politician which did not scruple at times to profit by the weakness of human nature.

In this latter respect, of trading at times on the weakness of human nature, Sir John Macdonald but reflected the type of politics of to-day. Political ambition, like ambition in other walks of life, is right enough in its way, if the way be that of uprightness and honour. Unhappily, in these latter days, politics though a science is not a system of ethics, but a game; and the game too often involves the sacrifice of everything reputable for the lust of office, with its patronage and gains. We do not say that Sir John Macdonald made any such sacrifice for personal ends, or besmirched his character for the sake of retaining power. His ideals, however, were not always heavenly, and his contact with men hardly led them to regard him as quixotically rigid in his principles, or of austere morals. He was not superhuman, only intensely human. So far as he was personally concerned, his political purity was unquestioned; and unquestioned too, we believe, was the purity of his domestic life. Socially, he was a delightful man to come in contact with, though perhaps a greater restraint upon himself and more dignity of manner would have become his position and honours. One thing can be said of him, that there was little conscious guile in the man, and hardly even a suspicion of cant. Irreverent at times he might be, but, on the other hand, he was never a sniveller; and no one could be more ready and infectiously merry with a jest. Always delightful, indeed, were his flashes of pleasantry, whether in the House or out of it; and to these, as much perhaps as to anything else, did he owe his great popularity. To his genial manners, especially to his amenities in Parliament, when the game tried the tempers of everyone, he owed the friendship and devotion of his followers. To the same qualities he owed the "sneaky" attachment (to use the term in the wooer's sense) of those who, on political grounds, could not give him their party allegiance. Nor did his cheerfulness, still less his courage, desert him in adversity. Even in the dark days of the Pacific Railway Scandal, he never repined or suffered his spirits to droop. With becoming contriteness he bowed his head to the storm, and, when the storm passed, he confidently resumed play at his winning game. In the game, as he played it, he could always be trusted to score with his mirthful heart.

As leader of his party he was dexterous and wary, and when hotly pressed by an opponent he could hit hard and with signal effect. But in the House he was not wont to be angry; on the contrary, his demeanour was as pleasant as his bearing was jaunty. If anything annoyed him, it was but for the moment, and seldom did the annoyance cause him to throw aside his habitual urbanity. Many were the occasions, though sometimes frivolous the offence, that brought upon him the wrath of an opponent. At such times, his weapon of retort was rarely anything more deadly than a delicious bit of raillery, perhaps even a felicitous compliment, with, it may be, a barbed arrow concealed inside. He was unusually ready, and often extremely clever, in repartee. Many and memorable are the sallies that broke from him in the House when silencing a member who had interrupted him in a speech or who ventured to ask an embarrassing question. What wonder that qualities like these endeared him to all and inspired an affectionate interest in his fortunes?

In departmental work, Sir John Macdonald's gifts were those of an industrious, careful, and painstaking chief. In council, he was sagacious, straightforward, and, in the main, ever mindful of the public interest. But it was in Parliament, and before the country, that he was best known to the people. He had great administrative ability, and in the management of the public business he was honest and efficient. Perhaps his special gifts were best seen in his direction and control of affairs in the Commons. He was well versed in Constitutional Law, and an almost infallible authority in Parliamentary procedure. His instinct was unerring in the measures to be brought before the House. Seldom did he initiate legislation or bring forward a Bill he could not carry without being submitted to mutilation. He had a keen scent in detecting measures emanating from the Opposition calculated to embarrass him, and these he usually had little difficulty in opposing or throwing over. He had a certain originative and constructive faculty; but in introducing new legislation, he preferred to follow rather than to be in advance of the age. In the business of the House he was always alert and sagacious, but rarely profound.

To know the best and the worst of any public man it is only necessary to read the columns of his party newspaper and then those of the organs politically opposed to him. Than Sir John Macdonald, probably no man in Canada has been more the victim of journalistic comment, both of praise and of blame. Alike extravagant have been the party organs on either side. With one of the parties throughout his life he has been anathema; and it is a surprise to-day that he has enough reputation left to make a shroud for his burial. With the other he has long been an idol, and no incense was too overpowering to waft in his face. Harm has unquestionably been done him by worship so extravagant and intense. It has led dispassionate minds to see in his life-work the service he was rendering to his party, rather than the service he was rendering to the nation. This is unfortunate, for there can be no doubt of his entire and disinterested devotion to the interests of his country. We frankly make this admission, though we as frankly withhold our commendation of the questionable elements which entered into and debased his politics. It is little amends to say, that elements equally questionable discredit the politics of the Opposition. With the party system we shall have corruption and methods of governing neither high-minded nor patriotic; but in politics, we hope, the reign of party is not forever to endure. To the system, Sir John Macdonald's memory will owe a light debt: as we have hinted, what he has done for party will cloud what he has done for the nation. To its violence, in the journals opposed to him, he owes not a little of whatever has detracted or will detract from his fame. As time passes this will become increasingly clear.

In Canada party and its evils may now be more honestly and trenchantly reprobated, since, admittedly, there is little here in the way of principles to justify the maintenance of the system. Its perpetuation can only bring disaster upon the State. Upon it sectionalism, both of race and creed, and the other ills that affect the body politic, have long been nourished and fed. The passing away of the great Tory leader, and the disintegration of party likely to follow that event, will create the opportunity for some measurable approach at least to national government. Only upon that neutral system can the diverse and incongruous elements, of which Confederation is composed, be honestly and efficiently governed. Upon that system, and that system alone, can the country's barque escape the rocks and find her way to smooth water. No one can fail to see, at all events, that partyism is not only a menace to Confederation but a strain upon the stability and cohesion of the State.

But for party, it is probable that Sir John Macdonald would not have enjoyed so long a tenure of office. This might have been better for his reputation, however, as it would have given him, in the ranks at least of his adversaries, a less censured name. Yet in its despite, he has achieved great things and given a continuity to the national life not only essential to its development, but helpful in laying broad the foundations upon which it is to continue to be upreared. For this good service, during the formative stage of the country, we have to thank Party and the strength—we had almost said the tyranny—of Party. It is for this service that England has honoured the now dead Chieftain in years that are gone, and for this, to-day she pays the tribute of respect to his memory.

What fate lies before the country, now that the hand that long guided it has dropped hold of the helm, who shall say? By the direction given to Canada in the past forty or fifty years by its once commanding figure, Sir John Macdonald may not only have steered its course for the time being nationward, but, for the future, may have baulked Destiny of its expectant triumph. The national problems may once more, and with greater force and perplexity, confront us; but, after all that has been wrought and suffered, craven would be he who now lost faith in the future. The "old Parliamentary hand," it is true, has lost its grip and now withers in the dust; but what that hand has shaped for the young nation, its sons surely will not think lightly of or heedlessly throw away.

Let us, however, look a little closer at the era upon which we have now fallen, that we may see more clearly what has been accomplished under the later régime of Sir John Macdonald and his Government. Almost a quarter of a century has now gone by since the country entered upon Confederation, and for a time hushed to a lullaby the strife of jarring interests and the din of faction. There are those, though we are not of the number, who not only doubted the wisdom of our politicians in committing the several Provinces to Confederation without a direct appeal to the people, but who, after these years, see no gain from the alliance, or at least counter-balance the gain by a heavy loss. It is too late in the day to re-open the first of these questions; the second is a more practical one here for consideration.

What the net results of Confederation are it is not difficult to say. There are, of course, two sides to the balance-sheet, and though exception may be taken to many of the entries on the debit side, and though the patriot heart may sink as it scans not a few of the items, there are offsets on the credit side which must be taken into equitable account before a true and impartial balance can be arrived at. We do not shut our eyes to the fact that Confederation has not assimilated, or is likely soon to assimilate, the whole people. A nation is not born in a day; it may be said, indeed, that a thoroughly-fused nationality can hardly be looked for on the status of a colony. But has there been no gain, nevertheless? Let those who assert this recall the position of things a score or more years ago, or go back a generation to the elemental state of these British American Provinces before the era of railways. True, Representative Government was an achievement of the times; and in the Union of the Provinces a beginning was made towards effecting that larger union which was to be attained later on. But the picture of the Canadas in "the forties" is the picture of a comparatively primitive community, awaking to the consciousness of the boundless possibilities before it, yet retarded by the rudimentary conditions that surround its existence. Since that era the whole face of the country has undergone change. What, emphatically and universally, was a wilderness, is now in a large measure a cultivated garden. Nature has yielded up its tyranny, and civilization is everywhere illumining the dark places with its cheer and light. Politically, the contrast is no less sharp. The old system of irresponsible rule has long since disappeared; and through many a stirring scene and angry tumult the power of the people has triumphed, and has established itself, in the main, in justice and right. The political rule of to-day, we shall of course be reminded, is far from heavenly; and faction notoriously has not gone off in a sweet sleep. But though we have not reached the millennium, we have solved many ugly problems, and overcome or averted many calamities that menaced the State.

In trade and commerce the national development also presents gratifying results. The industries of the country are beginning to rival the operations of agriculture, and to furnish increasing means of employment as well as to become a source of wealth. This much may be said without questioning the soundness of the fiscal policy of the Dominion, or committing oneself on so delicate a matter as the pros and cons of the "National Policy." The acquisition and opening up of our western domains is another and an important feature in the progressive life of the nation, and a signal mark of national advancement. Here again the other side of the picture obtrudes itself; and the advantages of extending the arms of the Dominion over a continent are discounted by the burdens entailed in opening the country for settlement. The obvious answer to this, however, is the one given by both political parties, in drawing upon the country's exchequer for the means to build the Pacific Railway, for, as it has a thousand times been asked, "What is the territory worth if you can't get access to it?"

Nor has the progress of the country been confined to material concerns. Its intellectual life has grown and expanded, and more than a beginning has been made in developing a native literature. Journalism flourishes, and the reading habit is becoming general. Art and education have spread and are spreading their refining influences, and, in the cities particularly, some measure of culture has been reached. Intellectually, as well as materially, Canada has made considerable progress, and her social condition, it may safely be said, is not behind that of any other people.

But there is another side to the picture. Undoubted as is the progress of the country, one need not be querulous in wondering why the progress has not been greater. Canada somehow or other does not attract immigration; in this respect she is far eclipsed by her southern neighbour. The climate may have something to do in limiting the incoming of settlers; or the immigration system, possibly, may be in default. There is we know attraction in numbers and an equally potent attraction in success. The greater wealth and immense population of the United States, together with the well-known enterprise of her people, must give her some advantage in drawing emigrants to her shores and in retaining them when she has got them. But, relatively, Canada might expect her share of immigration, which, however, she fails to get. What is there that prevents her obtaining this? Is there anything in the oft-mooted gift of citizenship that explains the matter? We fear there is. Nationality, we know, is more a sentiment than anything else, and in these day of levelling democracy predilections of sentiment are bound to manifest themselves. One thing is clear, that a nation in all things has the advantage of a colony. Why Canada remains in theory a colony while she has all but the status of a nation is one of those puzzles hard to make out. Confederation was a step, but not the

The devotion to duty and the single eye to the country's interests, which ever actuated Sir John Macdonald, ought at least to be an inspiration to us. His history is entwined with that of the State. Remembering this, how poorly would Canada's sons repay him who has gone, did they fail to profit by his toil, or esteem lightly the heritage he was instrumental in either winning or making for them. The disappearance from the scene of one who, far above his fellows, was the representative of the hopes and aspirations of the nation, comes in the natural course of events. The country could ill afford just now to lose him. But it loses him, confident that he will, in time at least, be replaced. This is the note of assurance that ought to find an echo in each patriot breast.

With the close of Sir John Macdonald's life there closes another era in the history of the possessions of Britain in the New World. This is, in itself, no small tribute to the head that long directed and the hand that skilfully shaped the destinies of a vast dependency of the Empire. That he has made the era of his political sway in Canada his own, and gained for the country abroad that recognition of its status and future promise which he was in large measure the means of creating, are facts admitted on every hand. To repeat them is to mark and emphasize the wonderful union of gift in the man by whom these things were wrought. How marvellously he has led Canada on in the path of progress and self-development, we who are of the country full well know; while those who are not of it bear this testimony, that once Canada was to them a mere geographical expression; now they know it not only as a great Colony of the crown, but all, save in name, a nation. This is the explanation of the esteem with which he was regarded, and the pride manifested in his triumphs in the loved motherland. The Fates, it may be said, were propitious in bringing Sir John Macdonald on the stage at an era ready for the coming of one able to direct and fashion it. But what he has accomplished has not been the work only of an opportunist, however nimble and tactical. Neither has it been achieved by mere adroitness in the methods of personally governing, still less by the wizardry, great as it was, of his manner. Not one gift, but many gifts, have gone to the making up of his record. Of these, even the superficial observer will own as pre-eminently his—commanding ability, steadfast and disinterested purpose, and a phenomenal faculty of not only winning men, but of fusing heterogeneous elements, and that by an alchemy so subtle as to seem to be his own secret and exclusive possession. Great was his opportunity, but great, unquestionably also, were his gifts. One other and universally admitted virtue was his—he was personally honest. Throughout his long public life, if he was fond of power, he never used it to enrich himself. This not only is his glory, but it is the glory of the country of which he was, in an especial degree, the benefactor—the country that proudly owns and honours him as son.

As we write, the loss that has befallen the nation has for the time hushed into an almost religious silence the strife of Party and buried forever the enmities of a long, stirring, and, may we not say, beneficent life. Shall not the loss bring its atoning and compensating gain? May we not see, as its fruit, our politics purified, our public life elevated and ennobled, our patriotism broadened and increased, the people set free from the enslavement and noxious influence of faction, and the country made more closely and enduringly one? When we can point to these results, then the old loved "Chieftain" may look down from another sphere, as in life he was wont to say that he would, and the seers of that time shall discern on the once thought-seamed but now serene and transfigured face the smile of unalloyed triumph and content.

LIFE AND CAREER

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LATE

EARLY YEARS.

CONTEMPORARY judgment of the several acts of even so great a life as that of John Alexander Macdonald may be sound. But the general tendency and broad effects of such a life must be left to be estimated by posterity, for only in the future will the results at which the Statesman aimed be made manifest. It is the office and duty of the contemporary historian, however, to record the facts as he finds them, together with such comments as are necessary to their due interpretation. The great fact to be made known, either in so many words or by wise compiling of the records, or both, is the estimation in which the man whose history is being written is held by people of his own time. Viewed from this point, the subject of this memoir takes rank among perhaps the smallest class known to history. Carlyle remarks of Goethe, that if certain qualities, which he is alleged to possess, were really his, then Goethe "must rank with Homer and Shakespeare as one of the only three men of genius who ever lived." That genius which enables him who possesses it to embody fictitious persons before our imagination as clearly as those we meet are made clear to our senses, may be, as Carlyle suggests, the only genius worthy of the name. But if the limit is to be extended in the least, it must be made to include the few who are born leaders of men. Some are the leaders of a time, some lead only a class, and the deeds they do are worthy of all praise and emulation. But the born leader of men shows his power, not only through his works but in his personal contact with those about him. Men have made or unmade empires, they have commanded victorious armies or directed mighty movements, and yet have remained themselves but little known to all, save those whom they used as their means of communication with the people at large. Their leadership is essentially the product of circumstance, and some of the men who have apparently had the most to do with making history are leaders of this class. "No man is great to his valet," according to a saying which has almost become a proverb. But it is not true; the man who is truly great will be recognized as such by his valet as by others. John A. Macdonald carried on his life-work in the limited sphere of a Colony even now far from populous, and having a history little longer than his own life. But such as his opportunities were, he made the most of them. He became the greatest man in the community in which he lived; he achieved, with the elements at his command, results which those who knew not his powers declared to be impossible, and, through it all, he moved daily with the people, and not one of the thousands with whom he came in contact but recognized him as truly great.

John Alexander Macdonald was by birth a clansman, descendant in direct line of Donald, Lord of Kintyre and Islay, a mighty man of valor in his day, who, in his old age, relinquishing his claymore to his son, Angus. In devotion and in benefactions to the church Lord Donald spent the closing days of a life which had seen its "dearest action in the tented field." From Angus descended a line of chiefs who, so long as force opposed them, not only held their own, but increased their borders and actually opposed in arms the power of all Scotland rallied about the king. But when James the First came to the throne, craft and treachery were employed, and by these the power of the warlike chiefs was broken. Invited by the king to meet and discuss in brotherly fashion the differences between them, Alexander, Earl Macdonald, accompanied by his mother and a few of his leading warriors and advisers, left the security of his island fortress and went confidently to Inverness—and to the dungeon. James treacherously seized the man whom he had asked to parley with him and, though sparing his life, deprived him of liberty. The effect upon the clansmen was disastrous. Left without their chief and leader, jealousy, distrust and apprehension played havoc with the strength which in the united clan Macdonald had been unconquerable. Taking the cue from his perfidious lord, Alexander vowed to the king a fealty which he had no intention of observing, and, on being released in consequence of his vow, at once sought his home to prepare his men for such a war as would teach tyranny and treachery a lesson. But the clan was not as he had left it, united and confident, but torn with dissensions, and the war resulted in disastrous defeat. On renewing his vow of fealty and undergoing banishment from his own land, Alexander Macdonald was again given liberty and control of the family domain. The time came, however, when the Macdonalds were divided into smaller groups, and from this fact arises the difference in the spelling of the name in different localities, for "Macdonnell" and "Macdonald," as is suggested by their similarity, are in origin the same.

Mr. Hugh Macdonald of the parish of Dornoch, Sutherlandshire, was a true descendant of the head and founder of the clan. In early life he moved to Glasgow and there he married Helen Shaw, of Badenoch, Inverness. The children of these two were five in number, the second son being John Alexander Macdonald, the subject of this memoir, who was born on the 11th of January, 1815. —The other children were William, James, Margaret, Louisa. In the year 1820 Mr. Macdonald decided to remove with his family to Canada. All the original members of his little household were then surviving except his eldest son William, a bright lad, who had died a short time before. All landed safely at Kingston, then the most important point in Upper Canada, after a voyage which, in the manner of those days, consumed many weeks' time.

This was in 1820, when the country was in its first rude beginnings. The original draft of United Empire Loyalists who had formed the bulk of the original British population of Upper Canada, and especially of this central section, had brought the wilderness into subjection in some places, and some towns had been founded, which promised well. Of these, as stated, one of the principal was Kingston, built near the site of the old fort which De Courcelles had established only to lose, and which the adventurous Frontenac, despite the instructions of his superiors, had rebuilt. When the little family reached Kingston, he who afterwards became the most distinguished man of this new country, was a child of five years, notable for his big expressive eyes and his sunny disposition. The father began business and worked hard and faithfully to win a living for himself and his family. He laboured under considerable disadvantages, however, for the country and its ways were new to him. He had not got far in the road to fortune in the first four years of his life in Canada, and, hoping for improvement in his circumstances, he embraced an opportunity that offered to remove to Adolphustown, on the Bay of Quinté. The move was not a very distant one, even in those days of corduroy roads and lumbering stage-coaches, but it was a very hard parting for one member of the family, young John Alexander, who was to be left behind to attend school. Hugh Macdonald had the true Scotsman's appreciation of learning, and had early determined to educate this bright and promising boy of his for one of the learned professions. The advantages of this course, even aside from the desire to give the boy an education for its own sake, were obvious. The country was still new, but it was rapidly developing. A few years' time was certain to bring a great demand for men of education to fill the widening ranks of professional life, and those who were early in the race and acquitted themselves well were certain of good pay and quick promotion. To qualify him for the career from which his father expected so much—though it is safe to say the fond parent's expectations of his son's future were far short of what we of to-day know the reality to have been—the lad was left in Kingston there to attend the Royal Grammar School, one of the best academies of its time in the Province. At this period the preceptor of the little college was Dr. Wilson, a man of special ability, a graduate of Oxford and a good teacher. The boy was a diligent student, being possessed of keen perceptions and a retentive memory. Though quick in everything, he showed a taste especially for mathematics. The working out of intricate problems delighted him. He was keen to see the principle involved and the methods to be used in applying it, and there was a certain faculty of order in his make up, which was satisfied by the methodical following out step by step of the plan best calculated to achieve the desired result. He was fond of reading and study, and had in plentitude that true faculty of the scholar which enables him to make what he reads his own. Though he spent less time than many of his contemporaries in the study of the classics, he got a firm grasp, especially of the Latin writers, as the public speeches he has made will show. During the course of his tutelage in the Royal Grammar School there was a change in his preceptors, Dr. Wilson giving place to Mr. George Baxter, who seems to have paid particular attention to his promising young pupil, and to have been very proud of him.

The lad spent his holidays at his new home in Adolphustown. To the summers thus spent is undoubtedly to be attributed in part the magnificent strength of constitution which was one of the many marvels of this marvellous man. Adolphustown, though still a small village without even railway communication, is a place of importance (from a historical point of view) unsurpassed in Canada. Here it was that the United Empire Loyalists, those sturdy defenders of a chosen cause, landed in Upper Canada. Under Captain Van Alstine, whose name is one of the heritages of that district, they came up the river in their Durham boats with the few worldly possessions left to them in their exile, and their voyage came to an end at that part of the densely wooded shore where afterwards grew up the village of Adolphustown. It is not of the historic associations of the place that we would speak, for these have been dealt with over and over again by leading Canadian writers. But the natural beauties of the locality, especially as they must have appealed to a boy coming home after the dull monotony of a session at school, should be adverted to, even though briefly. The Bay of Quinté region of which Adolphustown was at this time one of the principal places, is one of the most beautiful places in all this beautiful Canada. In those early days it must have been especially attractive, for there were many leagues of forest where now is only meadow, these forests protecting many streams, perfect in their beauty, which since the removal of the forest have run dry. It was a perfect empire for a boy to ramble over in summer, and in fishing and boating, in tramping the woods and climbing the hills, there was recreation and health besides. In after years the great statesman often spoke with enthusiasm of the delightful experiences he enjoyed about old Adolphustown.

In his charming book, "Random Recollections of Early Days," Mr. Canniff Haight speaks of the time when Mr. Hugh Macdonald and his family lived at Adolphustown. He says: "The father of Sir John A. Macdonald kept a store a short distance to the east of the Quaker meeting-house, on Hay Bay, on the third concession. It was a small clap-boarded building, painted red, and was standing a few years ago." In this connection he tells a characteristic anecdote about John A. Macdonald's appearance on the platform at Adolphustown some years afterwards, when he was known as a rising young Kingston lawyer, just feeling his way into political life. He began his speech in this fashion, "Yeomen of the county of Lennox and Addington, I remember well when I ran about this district a bare-footed boy." We can well believe it when Mr. Haight says, "I recollect how lustily he was cheered by the staunch old farmers on the occasion referred to."

But business did not flourish with Hugh Macdonald as he had hoped; Kingston was growing daily in size and importance, and, after four years on the Bay of Quinté, it was decided to remove to the city again. The experience he had gained enabled Mr. Macdonald to choose his place of occupation with judgment, and though he did not grow rich, the removal to Kingston proved a good step. He leased the Kingston Mills, an establishment of some importance just outside the city, and, to facilitate the sale of his goods, he kept a warehouse and shop in the city. The son, whose history it is the purpose of this book to relate, grew up a thorough Kingstonian. He loved the old Limestone City, and was always proud to be known as one of its citizens. The family became well known, and the lad was marked by those who could judge character as one of the men of the future. Of the period of his life which was begun by the return of the family to Kingston, many are the reminiscences which are now related by old ladies who were acquainted with the mother or sisters, and old men, some of whom were schoolmates (and who to-day feel proud to be able to claim that distinction), of the curly-haired boy who was destined to eclipse all other British Americans in fame. The mother of the future statesman is well remembered by many. It has been said that all great men have had the advantage of good mother-training. So it seems to have been in John A. Macdonald's case. His mother was proud of her boy and confident of his future. Her counsel gave him confidence in himself, her example taught him that indomitable courage and perseverance which were among his greatest qualities. And he, on his part, seems to have loved and honoured her, and to have grown up to desire honour and fame not a little for her sake. There was in the Macdonald family that intense family affection and loyalty which is characteristic especially of the Scottish people, who seem to be imbued at their very birth with the notion of clan-ship embodied in all the traditions of their country. It may be mentioned here that of the other members of the family the youngest son James died shortly after the family returned to Kingston. Margaret, the eldest daughter, married Professor James Williamson, of Queen's University, but has been dead for some years. Louisa, the younger sister, never married. She lived out the allotted span of human life, and died not long ago in Kingston, where nearly all her life had been spent.

Young Macdonald entered upon his seventeenth year carrying with him the love of mother, father and sisters, a favourite among a large circle of acquaintances, and one of the brightest scholars that had ever attended the school which was his alma mater. He was to study for the bar; that had been settled long before. Instead of having him go through college, Mr. Macdonald articed his son at once to a lawyer—choosing Mr. George Mackenzie, in whom he had great confidence as a lawyer and a man. The line of studies to be pursued was new to the youth, but in his time at school he had learned the student's trade pretty thoroughly, and he had besides the will and the determination to succeed. As he had won the praise of his schoolmasters, so young Macdonald succeeded in winning the good-will and admiration of his principal in his chosen profession. Mr. Mackenzie commended him for his diligence and for his ability as well. The result of his honest efforts to succeed was that he was qualified to be called to the bar professionally before nature had done her share of the work, for he was not then twenty-one, the official age for barristers. But the young man was too impatient to get to work at his chosen profession to allow a matter of this kind to prevent him. There was one person whose word as to the young man's age would be taken without question—his father. The young man made preliminary use of his knowledge of persuasive eloquence to convince his father that he was actually twenty-one and ripe for admission to the ranks of the profession. He won his case too, for his father was quite convinced that his son had reached his majority and so stated to those in authority. The result was that a modest sign, "John A. Macdonald," was soon hung out over the entrance to an office of which the future Premier was the occupant. The sign was not put out in vain, for the young lawyer soon found himself with a good practice and every prospect of making it a great one. People had been watching his career and had learned to respect him and to expect good things of him. A remarkable feature about the new law office was that it was made clear to the people that it was there for their benefit. In the scarcity of legal counsellors, for years before, the lawyers of the time had had bred in them a certain feeling of independence of their clients, so that one seeking legal advice put himself in the position of asking a favour, and, that being the case, he had to take what was given him and as the donor chose to bestow it. But so far as Kingston was concerned, a new order of things was inaugurated when the law office of John A. Macdonald was opened. The young man was there for business, and he gave everybody who came to consult him clearly to understand that fact. Instead of keeping would-be clients waiting in an ante-room merely to suit his own convenience, he made a study of promptitude and business-like methods. People soon found that there was one place where "the law's delays," even if they were not altogether done away with, were not aggravated by the lawyer's delays as well. The young man had a downright genius for popularity. Whether he knew at this time how his popularity was to be used even his friends of that early time do not seem to know. But certain it is that he made few enemies but a host of friends, and every person coming within the sphere of his personal influence felt drawn toward this brilliant young man who had merit and perfect confidence in himself, but who had none of the offensive assumption of superiority which is usually found in one who has a good opinion of his own abilities. Perhaps, without being fully conscious of it himself, the young man was preparing himself for opportunity, and magnificently did he take advantage of it when it came. Speaking of a different kind of work, but essentially of the kind of man we are writing about, Ruskin says in his noble lecture on "The mystery of Life and its Arts:" "Does a bird need to theorize about building its nest or boast of it when built? All good work

“is essentially done that way—without hesitation, without difficulty, without boasting; and in the doers of the best there is an inner and involuntary power which approximates literally to the power of the animal—nay I am certain that in the most perfect human artists, reason does not supersede instinct, but is added to an instinct as much more divine than that of the lower animals as the human body is more beautiful than theirs; that a great singer sings not with less instinct than the nightingale, but with more—only more various, applicable, and governable; that a great architect does not build with less instinct than the beaver or the bee, but with more—with an innate cunning of proportion that embraces all beauty, and a divine ingenuity of skill that improvises all construction.”

Such words apply with particular force to the opening career of John A. Macdonald. He could not have foreseen exactly how his chances of fame were to arise; he could not have known exactly how the perfecting of himself in his profession, or the ability to make and keep friends was to benefit him, but he went on without hesitation and without mistake, every step being an advance toward his appointed goal.

His power of making friends was not that of the man who seeks to gather about him a number of people who will help him. He had the honest human love of his fellows, and this caused him to deserve, as it enabled him to hold, the friendship of many whom other friends of his would not tolerate. Those were stirring and uncomfortable times in Canada. The demand was being made for Responsible Government both in the Upper and in the Lower Provinces. In the latter, the leaders in the movement were young men who, mistaking the effect for the cause, held that Republican institutions alone were compatible with freedom, and that separation from Britain alone would enable the people to establish the Republic. Though not going so far, the leading Reformers of Upper Canada—the Radicals of their time—were honestly believed by their opponents to be in favour of the separation of the colony from the Mother Country. The feeling that there were traitors in their very midst led to personal estrangements between those who would otherwise have been friends, and this feeling of personal bitterness grew as the strife became hotter, and the signs began to multiply that bloodshed and perhaps anarchy would be the result. It was a time of dreadful suspicion and suspense, a time of rancour and quarrelling. But, through it all, young John A. Macdonald, though known as a Conservative, had the friendship and esteem of many Reformers, as well he might, for he did all that lay in his power to deprive the situation of its element of personal bitterness. The Rebellion of 1837 broke out, but was quickly suppressed and its leaders imprisoned or scattered, but new complications arose to keep alive the bad feeling among the people.

Many are now living who can remember distinctly the events that followed the unhappy outbreak of 1837, and all who have read anything of Canadian history must be more or less familiar with the facts. The hatred of Britain engendered among the people of the United States by the War of Independence might have died out but for the complications arising out of Napoleon's mad attempt to conquer Europe and hold it in subjection. This led to the war of 1812-15, which fanned into even fiercer flame the ill-feeling of Americans against everything British. The exigencies of American politics had caused this feeling to be kept alive by one side at least. When the internal troubles in Canada arose, thousands of Americans good and bad believed that at last the northern Provinces had grown tired of what in their efflorescent oratory was called "the galling yoke of British tyranny," and they made ready to help the "oppressed" on this side of the border. "Hunters' Lodges" as they were called, were formed all along the border, backed and assisted by the money of some men who simply wished to hurt Britain, and of others who believed that the sacred cause of human freedom was to be fought out upon a new battle ground. These "Hunters' Lodges" were composed of "sympathizers" who were ready to go over at a moment's notice to help the people of Canada, who according to their theory were anxiously looking for their coming. The Navy Island affair, the attack upon Ahmerstburg, Bill Johnson's famous piratical raid, and other affairs of the kind followed, including the battle of the Windmill, an event with which this history has more particularly to deal.

The "Hunters" congregated in Ogdensburg early in November, 1838; and all along the St. Lawrence frontier, and especially at Prescott, which faces Ogdensburg from the Canadian side of the river, there was misgiving which rapidly grew to dreadful apprehension. The people had not long to wait, for on the 11th November upwards of 200 men fully armed crossed over in small boats, and, landing, took up their position in the windmill, a building strong enough to resist any ordinary assault. This little band of "sympathizers" was under the leadership of one Von Shoultz, a Pole, who had been impressed with the stories told him about the oppression of Canadians by the representatives of Britain, and for the love of freedom's cause alone, gave himself to the rescue. Von Shoultz expected to be joined by immense numbers of Canadians anxious to overthrow their oppressors. This was his own explanation of the case subsequently, and indeed his action in coming over with so small a force, and then making a stand in the place he did, is inexplicable upon any other theory. Of course he was disappointed. Even those who sympathized with the Rebellion regarded the matter as a family quarrel, and resented the interference of outsiders. As soon as the alarm was given, the whole district sprang to arms. Volunteers poured into Prescott from all quarters, and not a single man turned out to help the deluded Pole and his followers. Too late Von Shoultz saw that he had been entrapped. He could not venture to attack the town, his force was too small; he could not retreat, for vessels patrolled the river on the Canadian side, ready to sink his boats and annihilate his band. There was nothing to do but to surrender or stand at bay and fight it out. He chose the latter course. The little band of invaders fortified themselves as well as they could within the windmill. On the 13th, two days after they landed, a large force of Canadians under Col. Young, advanced to the attack. The battle was a long one, for at first only muskets were used, but afterwards the heaviest guns that were available were brought down, and cannonading was begun. The walls of the mill, though strong and thick, could not long resist this kind of thing. To remain was death to all, but by yielding the lives of some might be saved. Von Shoultz and his remaining men—about half his force had been killed or made prisoners—yielded to the inevitable and gave up their arms. The Canadians in this engagement escaped with the loss of nine men. The fact that the lives of nine good and patriotic men had been sacrificed by this mad and causeless interference with the affairs of a people well able to take care of themselves, however, caused intense feeling against Von Shoultz and his men, and the demand was general that an example should be made of them which would deter others from following the same course. Von Shoultz and his accomplices were arraigned for trial by court martial sitting in Kingston. The unfortunate men must needs be represented by a man able to plead their case. The brilliant young lawyer, John A. Macdonald, was chosen. His opportunity had come.

The trial of Von Shoultz excited tremendous interest. He had no sympathizers and few friends, but of these even the most hopeful could not look forward to a favourable outcome of the trial. John A. Macdonald went to work upon the case conscientiously. But as he became acquainted with his client and learned how completely the Pole had been deluded, how earnestly he had believed that in this ill-starred expedition he was following the example of his many compatriots who had fought freedom's fight to the death, he became interested and even enthusiastic in the preparation of his defence. In court he conducted his case ably; it is not too much to say that he did it brilliantly. The case was a desperate one, considering the offence, the character of the court and the state of public feeling, and it is not to be wondered at that the pitiless military law was not altered from its course. Von Shoultz was condemned to death and he was executed, according to one historian who ought to be best informed of the facts, on December 8th, 1838. Before his death he expressed himself as satisfied with the verdict—he had allowed himself to be misled to the terrible injury of many innocent people, and it was but reasonable that he should suffer the penalty. He even wrote letters from the condemned cell to friends in the United States that the stories he had been told about the wrongs and sufferings of the Canadian people were wholly misleading, and that there was nothing in the fact of his death that ought to cause his friends to think of seeking vengeance or making reprisals. The effect of the trial was to acquaint the people at large with the character of this romantic leader of a lost cause, and to excite in his case a feeling which, by comparison with that with which other sympathizers were regarded, might almost be called sympathy. If the people could not consent to the continuance of Von Shoultz' life, they could at least praise and honour the young man of only twenty-three years who had shown himself so well read, so clear-headed, and so able with his tongue in defence of the unfortunate man. In speaking of the case, one of the Montreal newspapers said, editorially, that the young Kingston lawyer who had defended Von Shoultz would soon be known as one of the first men of the country. Prophecies are not always fulfilled, but this one was realized so much more completely than even the man who made it could have expected, that he might be far astray in some of his other predictions and still claim a very good average.

Soon after the trial a student was admitted to John A. Macdonald's office. He has since become known to fame as Sir Alexander Campbell, with a long and honourable political record leading up to the Lieutenant-Governorship of Ontario, which he now holds. But another student who was to become even more famous entered the office soon after. He, like the other two, was of Scottish stock; he had turned out as one of the defending volunteers when the cry of alarm was raised in 1837, and in his school and college career he had shown himself painstaking and splendidly persevering. He graduated from John A. Macdonald's law office to the political arena, afterwards to the bench, and subsequently to the Premiership of Ontario, which position he holds to-day. To say this is to tell the reader that the name of that young student was Oliver Mowat. It would be a curious study for some one to undertake, to learn how far the future of these men, whose training, while he himself was but a youth, John A. Macdonald had in charge, was moulded by his influence. If it was merely a coincidence that two great lawyers and statesmen graduated from the office of the greatest lawyer and statesman the country has ever known, surely no coincidence ever was more wonderful.

Business grew and flourished with John A. Macdonald. Many private clients were attracted by his talents and his personal magnetism. The Commercial Bank was founded by John S. Cartwright, and John A. Macdonald was appointed its solicitor. The Trust and Loan Company, since grown to one of the greatest institutions of its kind, was established, and this also placed its legal business in the hands of the rising young lawyer.

He had established himself in business. His opportunity to enlarge his sphere of action and usefulness was at hand.

POLITICAL UPHEAVALS.

PERHAPS it were well to pause here and take a backward glance at the causes which brought about the troublous times referred to in the foregoing chapter. Half a century before the British Parliament divided the Province of Canada into Canada Upper and Lower, each division corresponding with what is to-day Quebec and Ontario. By this partition it was hoped that each province would enjoy constitutional peace and bound forward in the paths of progress. Burke, indeed, who had been caught and flung back into the most abject toryism by the influence of the French Revolution, saw a golden peace in the future for the Canadas now, and regarded as guarantees for the abiding principle of the system the restrictions upon popular liberty placed in the Constitution. But many statesmen shook their heads, and Fox predicted that these vaunted safeguards of peace and an abiding constitution would prove the seeds of discord and disruption. And so it proved; though the evil laid in the marrow of the system did not break out into an active sore for many years afterwards. To each province was given a constitution supposed to reflect the virtues and the liberties of the constitution of the mother land. There was an elective chamber where the sturdy yeoman and simple habitant clad in their homespun came to legislate upon their allotted questions. There was an upper chamber, supposed to be a reflex of the House of Lords, the members of which were appointed by the Crown for life. To these were given the prerogative of altering or rejecting bills which came up from the lower chamber. The councillors were men of high social standing including even prelates and judges. Then came the executive; a mimic privy council, composed of men elected by the viceroy to advise with him on all matters of public administration. The members of this body were drawn from the legislative council, or from the house of assembly, were not obliged to have a seat in the popular branch, and were responsible only to the head of the government. The governor was a mimic king, and in those days had all the ways of a sovereign. "I am accountable to God only for my actions," said Charles the First, when presented with the Petition of Right. "I am accountable to the King only for my actions" said the little Canadian mock-sovereign, when meekly reminded of what was due to the people.

These were not the days of darkness, neither were they the days of light; rather both kings and commons lived in a sort of twilight where the liberty of the present seemed to merge in the oppression of the past. Since before the time when the barons wrung from John at Runnymede, the Charter of their liberties, everyone had talked about the "right of the subject" and the "prerogative of the Crown;" but none seemed to know where the one began or the other ended. Under the reign of the Prince of Orange, men who remembered the tyranny of the profligate Stuarts, thought they lived in the noon-day of constitutional liberty. But it remained yet for George the Third to set up a tyrant who did not rival the author of "Thorough," only because he lacked ability for anything but profligate intrigues, and the additional and self-sufficient reason that Englishmen having tasted of a liberty unknown in the days of Charles, would not be driven again into abasement by a cleverer tyrant than Strafford. Truly, for tyranny was the spirit of those Georges, willing, but the flesh was weak. "I will die rather than stoop to opposition," said George the Third; but opposition was better than revolution, and he stooped. For years he retained ministers in defiance of the House of Commons, resisted the entry of good men, of whom Fox was one, into the Cabinet, and maintained a system of wrong-headed personal government that cost the country a hundred millions of pounds, thirteen provinces, and the lives of a thousand subjects.

His son William the Fourth, though called "The People's Friend," still dismissed or retained a minister "when he pleased, and because he pleased;" but with him, we may well believe, disappeared from the royal closet forever the last vestige of personal government. A flutter, it is true, went through the breasts of the jealous guardians of constitutional liberty not many years ago when the commons discussed the "Question de jupons;" when a minister of whom the nation had grown sick, a man who dandled cushions and played with feathers while momentous questions of the state were hanging, resigned the seals and two days later crept back again to power behind the petticoats of the ladies-in-waiting. But if anything were needed to give assurance of constitutional rule, it surely must have appeared, when, with girlish frankness, the young Queen told Peel, "I liked my old ministers very well, and am very sorry to part with them; but I bow to constitutional usage." It is not written in the constitution where the power of the sovereign shall begin or end in retaining or dismissing ministers; but he would be a bold ruler indeed who should ever again attempt personal rule in England. Should such an attempt be made, it were not necessary to fear for the people. It would be only the worse for that sovereign.

But while the principles of liberty were growing broader and deeper in England, the people of the colonies were chafing under a yoke as intolerable as that felt in England at any time during the reign of the Stuarts. In the provinces of Canada the long heard cry of discontent had grown deeper and more ominous towards the close of the reign of William the Fourth. Wise men looked into the future then as they look ever, but we wonder that they could not have foreseen the consequences of such government as was now imposed upon the Canadian people.

Each province, as we have seen, had its mimic king, and this creature generally ruled with the spirit of an autocrat. It mattered little that the man was good when the system by which he governed was so very bad. There existed at this time in every province a combination which bore the hateful name of "Family Compact." This compact was composed of men who were tories by profession, and who came, by virtue of the preference they had so long held above their fellow colonists, to regard their right to public office as prescriptive. They filled the legislative council, which became the tool of the Crown to thwart or strangle any objectionable measure sent up from the chamber of the people. They filled every office of emolument from the Prime Minister to the sergeant-at-arms; from the chief justice down to the tip-staff. "Nor did Israel 'scape the infection," for they were found in the church which in turn furnished mitred heads to the council. They looked upon the large bulk of the colonists as inferiors, and viewed with alarm the movement in favour of what was called Popular Rights. Every point gained by the people they regarded as something lost to the Crown; and when a governor came to the colony they generously surrendered themselves to his pleasure. If he were some haughty autocrat, who looked upon the colonists as the owner of a plantation in Jamaica regarded his slaves, they seconded his opinions and zealously assisted him to rule as he would. If he happened to be a generous man, and was disposed to listen to the demands of the people, they poured poison into his ear, and gradually led him to regard the most worthy popular tribunes who asked for reform as dangerous demagogues. It seemed to be the fate of every man who in these days came out to govern us to turn tory the moment he set foot upon our soil. The whigs, who in England set themselves up as the redeemers of our liberty, outdid their opponents when they came to Canada.

When the tory came here he outdid himself. But the toryism which ground down the people of this country for so many dark years was not the toryism that was known in England. Had it been, the history of our own times would have formed a more turbulent chapter.

From this Family Compact the governor, whether whig or tory, drew a circle of advisers which he called "The Executive;" but he did not feel himself bound to seek the advice of its members, unless for courtesy, or when beyond his depth. But where the council were of the same mind as the governor, restraints were not needful; and in the executive for many a year the viceroy found a willing tool to aid him in governing according to his conviction or caprice. In Quebec the wheels of government rolled on with an incessant jar which threatened a disruption. It was hard for the French to forget that they were a conquered people, even under the most liberal foreign rule; but the intolerable oppressions of the dominant clique brought out all the race préjudices, and, not unnaturally, gave an alarming magnitude, sometimes, to the smallest grievance. But there was enough of weighty grievance. The home government had fostered and kept up a British party, a little clique which threw themselves in with the governor and ruled in defiance of the vast majority. The upper chamber was filled with this clique, and they sat with eagle eyes watching to destroy any measure opposed to their interests coming from the lower chamber. It was a long and fierce wrestle, that, between the two houses, but in every contest the habitant went to the wall. From the ranks of this clique, too, was filled the executive council, puppets of an autocrat governor, and the demoralizers of a man of fair play. Again and again would the house of assembly declare it had no confidence in a minister; but it was coolly recommended to mind its own affairs, and not to meddle with those which were only the governor's. For nearly half a century the French had worn this galling yoke, and now determined to cast it off. Finding how hollow a thing to them was responsible government, in 1832 they suddenly stopped the supplies. Then came about "the officials' famine," and for four years judges walked the land in shabby ermine, while "every description of official began to put his corporosity off." This was a harsh kind of revenge, but surely it was not unprovoked. A people goaded for half a century cannot be much blamed if they, as a last resort, seize a weapon of resistance lawful and constitutional. We know that some of those upon whom the heavy hand fell were not responsible; but they were the servants of an atrocious system. While the world came to look full of ruin to the official, Louis-Joseph Papineau, a man of honourable character and much energy, offered a series of ninety-two resolutions to the legislature to present to the imperial parliament. These resolutions contained a formulary of grievances against the home government and its agents in Lower Canada. The counts set forth, in brief: "Arbitrary conduct on the part of the Government; intolerable composition of the legislative council (which, they insisted, ought to be elective); illegal appropriation of the public moneys, and violent prorogation of the provincial parliament." They pointed out, likewise, that the French people had been treated with contumely; that they had been shut out from office by the favoured British; that their habits, customs and interests were disregarded, and they now demanded that the doors of office and emolument be thrown open to all—or they would rebel, the resolutions hinted between the lines.

The little British party, alarmed for their beloved flesh-pots, sent to the imperial parliament a set of counter resolutions. The Commons perused both without much emotion, and sent out Lord Gosford and two commissioners to clear up affairs in the confused colony. Lord Gosford came out with a large stock of that material with which it is said the road to a certain place is paved; but he fell into the hands of the compact, and chose to walk according to tradition rather than to the impulses of right.

Meanwhile, Papineau had allowed magnificent visions of a future republic along the banks of the St. Lawrence to lure him away from the path of sober, unambitious reform, in which he had earlier trod. He had to deal with a people, too, who have more than once in history become the slaves of a blind enthusiasm; and in those speeches at which the monster crowds cheered the loudest could be heard the first breathings of rebellion. The two commissioners who had come out with Lord Gosford presented their report to the imperial parliament, and the outcome of this was Lord John Russell's Ten Resolutions. By one provision of these resolutions the Governor was authorized to take £142,000 out of the funds in the hands of the Receiver-General to pay the arrearages of civil salaries. In vain Lord John was told that his resolutions would drive the people into rebellion, and perhaps into the arms of the Republic; but that haughty little statesman did not anticipate any trouble from the Republic, and as for the Canadians, they were very lightly taxed, he said, and had really but little to grumble about.

As had been predicted, the resolutions brought the discontent to a head. It is hard now to believe that Papineau did not really rejoice at the coercive spirit of those measures, for they gave him an ample pretext for soaring off towards that new republic of which he so fondly dreamed. The people became enraged, and from hot reformers changed into flaming patriots. They resolved to use no more goods that came through the custom house, and to smuggle rather than pay duties. Monster meetings were held by Papineau, at which the habitants were told to strike now for liberty. Men who knew anything, of military tactics began to drill large bodies of the inhabitants, while every man provided himself with some weapon that would kill. Then the outbreak came, and the poor habitants, in wild enthusiasm, rushed upon the cold bayonets of Lord Gosford. It was only the history of political tyranny the world over, again—lashing the people into rebellion by bad laws and worse administrators, and driving them back again into allegiance with cruel steel. We are told that the blood of a man who falls by the violence of his fellow will cry to heaven for vengeance; a heavy account, then, must be that of those men by whose oppression these poor habitants were driven away from their humble toil to meet death at the hands of the soldiers.

The flame having burst forth in Lower Canada, it was soon communicated to the ready material in the upper province. There, too, did the Family Compact furnish an irresponsible executive to an autocrat governor. The people dreamed of constitutional freedom, for the light which now was shining across the Atlantic was dawning here. Great men are usually the offspring of an important crisis; and now a party of superior men, all of high character, and many of good social standing, had grown up; and they demanded that the government of the province should be taken out of the hands of the favoured, irresponsible few, and handed over to the majority of the people through responsible ministers. This change would purge away the long train of evils of which the people had so long complained. In those days there was no popular check upon bad administration, or even upon corruption. Many a minister grew rich upon his peculations, because the eye of the public could not reach him. But some journalists now boldly intruded upon the sacred privacy of the ministry, and revealed to the public many instances of official mismanagement and corruption. Then it was that the history, in which we read of the disgraceful persecution of Wilkes by a tyrannical sovereign, was repeated in Upper Canada. Then came prominently upon the stage the ill-starred Lyon Mackenzie, a man whose name in his day served to hush the babes of loyal mothers to sleep. We persecuted him then in every conceivable way. We sent the most loyal and respectable of our young men to scatter his types and wreck his printing presses. We five times expelled him from the legislature, after he had been five times elected. Finally we drove him into rebellion, and set a price of £1,000 upon his head. Now, we are about erecting a column to his memory.

It was galling enough to see a mimic king come over here to govern us, as if God had made us only to be governed; but it was unbearable that the political adventurer, besides being an autocrat, should be also a blockhead. To quell the fast-increasing tumult in Upper Canada, the British government set about to select a man. They found one in a poor commissioner's office in Kent, surrounded with prayers for relief and heroic poems. This was an extraordinary man, and had done things in his day which, in the eyes of the government, qualified him well to rule a colony. He had written several pamphlets, extraordinary for their style, and instinct with "fine frenzy." Twice he had dashed across the South American pampas, from Buenos Ayres to the Andes, on the back of a mustang. Upon this man the home government let the mantle of authority fall, and dispatched him to Upper Canada. He came amongst us with the pomp of an Alexander, and the attitudes of a Garrick. The band of persecuted men who had fought so long for popular rights beseeched him to redress their grievances, but after a few dramatic revolutions on his own responsibility, poor Sir Francis Bond Head fell into the fatal circles of the Compact maelstrom. Naturally, with a colony in the incipient throes of revolt, we might have expected the home government to send a man with some fitness, natural or acquired, to govern and make smooth, but at this day we are unable to see what special training in this direction could have been conferred upon an enthusiastic tragedy-reader by galloping about the pampas on a wild pony. It is not necessary to add that the action of the new governor drove the impatient seekers for reform towards the brink of rebellion. In the house of assembly the Speaker read a letter from Joseph Papineau, urging the Upper Canada reformers in covert terms to rebel, and hinting that, in case of need, republicans would come over and help them. Here was an opportunity for the dramatic governor, and he seized it. "In the name of every militia regiment in Canada," he exclaimed, with a tremendous wave of his arms, as he closed the parliament, "I promulgate, let them come if they dare." There was then nothing for the reformers to expect from Sir Francis. He was threatened with rebellion, but treated the threat with seeming scorn, and sent all the soldiers out of the country. In an evil moment, and without taking counsel of prudence or philosophy, Mackenzie and his followers rushed to arms. Then brother rose against brother, and after a conflict in which smoke predominated, the government demonstrated its strength, and the cause of the rebels ended in panic.*

Lord John Russell could not have heard the news from Canada with much astonishment, for he had been told that just those things would happen, and he seemed coolly to court the consequences. In the commons some made light of the rising, and spoke of "a Mr. Mackenzie," concerned in the rebellion. Mr. Hume replying, cited the declarations of Chatham on the Stamp Act, instancing them as the sayings of "a Mr. Pitt." They had queer opinions in England then about colonics, and equally odd notions about how they should be governed. Some statesmen claimed that the executive should have the confidence of the house of assembly, but Lord John Russell and other whigs held that to make the executive responsible to the popular branch would be to reduce the governor to a cipher, and to virtually proclaim the independence of the colonies.

In this emergency Lord Durham was sent out to Canada with extraordinary powers. He proclaimed his Ordinances from Quebec, but had scarcely begun to carry out his programme when many voices began to clamour for his recall. Undoubtedly there was a disposition to judge Lord Durham in England on the scantiest evidence. His emotional nature was not unknown to the public. Men had not forgotten how often he had terrified his father-in-law, Earl Grey, and appalled the council by his outbursts at their cabinet meetings. They had heard him in the House of Lords describe the speech of the Bishop of Exeter, against the Reform Bill, as "coarse and virulent invective, malignant and false insinuation, the grossest perversion of historical facts, decked out with all the choicest flowers of pamphleteering slang." They did not believe that a man with a head so hot was fitted to grapple with such a problem as was now presented in Canada. But every day added fresh rumours to those already current in England. The famous Ordinances of the Earl seemed to astound everybody. They were sweeping measures, to say the least, and in England were regarded as revolutionary. An amnesty was granted to all political offenders, Papineau, Mackenzie and the other leaders, excepted. These were banished to Bermuda, from which they were not to return under pain of death. The colonists were cordially invited to aid in organizing a liberal and enduring plan of government; and, attended by his suite, the High Commissioner made a progress through the country with all the pomp and splendour of an Eastern king. But Lord Durham was not allowed to put his Ordinances to a trial. His course was assailed in England by a storm of hostile criticism; it was shown that in nearly every important respect he had transcended his constitutional powers; that he could not transport to Bermuda, for the reason that he had no authority over that island, and that he had no power to order that any one breaking his exile and returning to Canada should suffer death. One of the most fierce of his critics was Lord Brougham, but the whole cause of his bitterness was not the Quebec Ordinances. Five years before, at a dinner given by Earl Grey, he had imprudently provoked Lord Durham and called down upon his head a torrent of wrath. The government, who first stood like a weak man in a strong current feebly facing the stream, supported their Commissioner for a time, then faltered and gave way. In an American newspaper the Earl read for the first time that the government had forsaken him; and he tendered his resignation. The resignation and the disallowance of his Ordinances crossed each other on the Atlantic, and a few days later the proud and great Lord Durham learnt that he was a disgraced man. With constitutional impulsiveness he issued a proclamation which was simply the justification that a lofty spirit, too noble and too sensitive for the rude shocks of party strife, sought before the country he had so earnestly striven to serve. Humiliated beyond the length that a mean mind can imagine, he returned to England, his proud spirit broken.

* All our histories make the inexcusable blunder of stating that a large number of persons were killed and wounded at this battle; even Mr. Lindsey, son-in-law of Mr. Mackenzie, repeats the fiction in his book many years after the battle. To the Toronto World the public are indebted for ferreting out the blunder.

It has been said that he went beyond his constitutional powers; but surely he did not do so unknowingly. No better justification of his conduct can be given than is afforded in his own words, when he asks with just scorn: "What are the constitutional principles remaining in force when the whole constitution is suspended? What principle of the British Constitution holds good in a country where the people's money is taken from them without the people's consent; where representative government is annihilated; where martial law has been the law of the land, and where trial by jury exists only to defeat the ends of justice, and to provoke the righteous scorn and indignation of the community." But it remained for posterity to do justice to Lord Durham. While he lay gasping away his last breath by the sea shore at Cowes, came the tidings, but all too late, that even his bitterest foes bore tribute to the wisdom and broad statesmanship in his Report. This was the document that first set forth the scheme by which our struggling provinces afterwards became united in one confederation; which traced the causes of colonial discontent, and pointed out the cure. Toward the close of July, 1840, the earl breathed his last. Two days before he died he said: "I would fain hope that I have not lived altogether in vain. Whatever the tories may say, the Canadians will one day do justice to my memory." They have done justice to his memory; and one of the foremost names in their affections and their history is that of the great, the high-minded John George Lambton, first Earl of Durham.

The Government were not satisfied, it appears, with what they had done for Upper Canada in sending over Sir Francis B. Head, but on his being recalled, endeavoured to do better, and sent out Sir George Arthur. He was deemed to possess the very acme of governing powers, for he had already ruled two colonies. He governed 20,000 negroes and several whites in Honduras, and when selected for Canada had just returned covered with glory from Van Diemen's Land. This latter was a colony to which, about thirty years before, the home government had begun to send the most violent and abandoned characters. Armed with the experiences of Honduras and Tasmania, Governor Arthur began to rule Upper Canada. It took a great deal to fill up his bill of duty. In tumult he stamped every rebellion splutter out with the heel of a Claverhouse; in peace he was busy with the halter. It nigh drove him mad when a reformer approached him to state a grievance, or ask a mercy for the misguided men who had fallen into his hands. Reform, he said, had been too long the cloak of treason—therefore he would talk only of stern justice now. And the governor chose a bloody justice. He hanged Lount and Matthews in Toronto, to the horror even of many tories. It is due, however, to the governor's memory to say, that he was not entirely guilty of the blood of these men; as it is understood that the deed was strongly recommended by the officials of the Family Compact. We know not to what extent the governor would have used the rope, had not Lord Glenelg aroused himself from his languor to stay the fell work of the hangman.

In Lower Canada, affairs were in chaos. The constitution had been suspended, and the affairs of the colony were being administered by a special council. The British population, who now found themselves more than ever estranged from the French, prayed for union with Upper Canada, for freedom from French laws and French dominion; and beseeched all the legislatures of British North America to assist them in attaining these things. The French inhabitants had felt the yoke of a few British sit so heavily upon them that they regarded with horror a proposal which they believed would utterly absorb them into the English system, with its uncongenial customs and political oppressions.

In 1839, Sir John Colborne went home, and the British Government, finding that the most unsuitable men did not make the best governors, selected a plain merchant, Mr. Charles Poulett Thompson, who was known to have a clear, cool head, much suavity and tact, and an enormous capacity for business. The great drawback to him was that he possessed no title, an inferiority keenly deplored by the tories; but the government, though partial to titled men themselves, overcame their scruples and sent him out. His first duty was to act on a suggestion made by Lord Durham, whom the tories had slandered and the whigs deserted. That duty was to unite Upper and Lower Canada.

The new governor-general promptly convened the special council of Lower Canada, and obtained its assent to a draft bill providing for the Union. It was known that the French, who comprised the great bulk of the population, were hostile to the scheme, and they were not consulted. The measure was foreshadowed in the Speech opening the legislature of Upper Canada. Subsequently, a message was sent down to the assembly, embodying, among other matters, the chief points of the proposed Union Bill. This message gave some hope to the reform politicians, but one of its most important statements was a lie. "So far," said the governor-general, "as the feeling of the inhabitants of Lower Canada can be obtained the measure of re-union meets with approbation." The governor very well knew that nothing could be more hateful to the bulk of the inhabitants than this same measure; and for this very reason he had refused to consult them. The Bill was introduced in due course and was opposed by the Family Compact. But the governor-general was in earnest, and what was better, he was master of the situation. They might pass the bill or submit to worse. So they ate their leek with all the grace they could command.

In July, the next year, a measure was introduced into the imperial parliament and passed with slight amendments. The Union Bill provided that there should be one legislative council and one assembly. Each province had equal representation in both branches. The legislative council consisted of twenty members, who held their seats for life; the Assembly consisted of eighty-four members, who were to be elected every four years. The executive council was to consist of eight members, and any of those who had a seat in the assembly had to go back for re-election on taking office. A permanent civil list of £75,000 was established, but the control of the revenues was vested in the assembly. In 1841 the Act went into force by proclamation. To the reformers the race was not yet, though the tone of Lord John Russell's despatches had favoured responsible government.

Mr. Thompson had all the qualities of an excellent ruler, but he needed more light. Our historians, we believe, have quite overrated him. It is hard to doubt that, had he been spared to the limit of his term, the crisis which came under Metcalfe would have come under him. Though the first ministry after the Union was a coalition, he stubbornly refused to admit deserving French-Canadians to a share in the government, and though the reformers were in a majority in the house, only one of their number, Mr. Robert Baldwin, was called to the executive. And the governor's subsequent refusal to do justice to the reform party forced Mr. Baldwin out of the government and into opposition.

On the death of Mr. Thomson, who, while dying, learnt that he had been created Baron Sydenham of Toronto, Sir Charles Bagot was appointed to the governorship. Now, Sir Charles was sent out by a tory government, and was a tory himself. The reformers turned blue when they heard of his appointment, and believed that the evil days of the Heads and the Arthurs had come again. But the tory proved himself more liberal than the liberal. He was the only governor, Durham excepted, who really understood what was due to the colonists under constitutional government. Lord Sydenham would not traffic with pitch lest he might defile himself; but the old tory understanding that he came to carry on responsible government, invited leading members of the French party in Lower Canada, and Mr. Baldwin and his followers in Upper Canada, to form a ministry. "The Crusader has turned Turk," gasped the Family in horror, as the "Republicans crowded to the cabinet."

Towards the close of the year Sir Charles's health began to fail him, and he asked to be recalled. Then Sir Robert Peel cast about him to find a man to send to Canada, and his choice fell upon one whose name afterwards became hateful to all lovers of constitutional liberty. Sir Charles Metcalfe, Peel's baneful choice, had begun life as a writer in the Indian civil service. By the sheer force of his abilities he had scaled the steep ways of fame, till in 1834 he found himself acting Governor-General of India. Sir Charles was both astute and cunning; and besides these qualities his bravery was with him a point of honour. In his day the military held in contempt the soldierly prowess of civil servants in India, and Mr. Metcalfe, hearing that among the rest his intrepidity was called in question, resolved to affirm the valour that was in him. So when the British troops were before Deeg, armed with a walking stick, he headed an attacking party, rushed into the town, and

retrieved his reputation. In 1839, he entered the imperial privy council, and shortly afterwards became governor of Jamaica. Here, it is said, he won golden opinions, but we are told by his biographer, whose aim seems to have been to cover him with glory, that during his rule there "some outbreaks occurred, but they were speedily crushed and their instigators punished, some capitally." This was not, it will be frankly admitted, an indifferent training for a man who looked upon refractory reformers as he did upon rebellious negroes. Added to this, during his long contact with the wiles and treachery of oriental craft, he had grown incurably suspicious, and would trust any man who differed from himself as he would "an adder fanged." He came to Canada and to his amazement found a system of responsible government which did not need a governor, and, as some of the advisers of the Crown, men who had given sympathy or aid to rebellion. He was disgusted, too, with the manners of his councillors, who approached him with a brusqueness and familiarity that was revolting to a ruler of nabobs. With the cunning of a Nana Sahib, he sent out his confidential secretary, who wormed out of the ministers over their wine their opinions on the powers of the governor. The truth is, Sir Charles was like a captain who in a storm and amidst the breakers sets himself down for the first time to learn navigation. He knew nothing about the governing of a colony under responsible government: few governors in those days did. It was not the men who had sat in cabinets and saw how people are ruled under constitutional forms, that they sent out, but some one who had ridden mustangs great distances, or coerced Hindoos or negroes with the strong arm of the autocrat.

When Sir Charles learnt the opinion of ministers about his prerogative, he became incensed. He saw that his prerogative was in danger, and the point of prerogative to him was the point of honour. And how high with him was the point which he regarded the point of honour will appear from his exploit with the walking stick. Then began the system of wily and treacherous diplomacy which he had learned in the East. With utter disregard for constitutional decency, he outraged the privacy of his cabinet, and took the opponents of the ministry into his confidence. Day after day he planned and set snares for his own ministers. A close friend of his, who knew his ways and wrote his biography, thus glories in the governor's shame: "He saw that the feet of the council were on the wire, and he skilfully concealed the gun." Many an appointment was then made that the ministry knew nothing about till they read it in the public prints of their opponents. It was galling to be treated as ciphers by the head of the government—to feel that the position of adviser was only a mockery; but it was unbearable to hear the sneers of opponents who were the real advisers of the governor. The ministry resigned, and one wonders how they could have lived down contempt so long. For nine months now there was no ministry save Dominick Daly, the "perpetual secretary," who as a politician had been all his life at once "everything and nothing." This political merman assisted the Dictator till a provisional ministry was formed, after which, in a whirlwind both parties rushed to the polls.

It was at this crisis that Mr. John A. Macdonald, with his judgment much ripened, emerged from his law office, and began the stormy career of a politician.

CHAPTER III.

FROM THE BAR TO THE HUSTINGS.

THOSE who enjoyed the confidence of Mr. Macdonald say that after his defence of Shoultz, his aim was to win a still more prominent place in his profession. As we have already seen, his defence of the Pole gave him more than a local reputation ; it was, as his friends used to say, " a feather in his cap " of which a veteran member of the bar might have been proud ; and persons coming to Kingston with difficult cases from distant points, thereafter inquired for " the young lawyer who defended the Pole, Von Shoultz." These were the days of exclusiveness and snobbery, when it was almost as difficult to approach the august person of a Dodson or a Fogg as the Sleeping Beauty overhung with alarum bells and guarded by fiery dragons. There was a population of over half a million, and the immigration tide poured constantly upon us from the mother countries through the summer, but among this influx came few educated persons, and but rarely a member of the learned professions ; so that the doctor and the lawyer were not in proportion to the population, were much sought after, and hence garrisoned round with importance. But no client, however poor, came out of Mr. Macdonald's office complaining of snobbery ; rather telling of the courteous and gentlemanly young lawyer, " quick as a flash," who understood his case better than the client himself before he had " half told it." In those days, more than at the present time, which produces lawyers and stump orators " not singly but in battalions," when a young man discovered brilliant talents, or the power, by his eloquence, to carry his hearers, his friends invariably said,

“ We must send him to the House.” We are told that in many a case which Mr. Macdonald pleaded, even strangers in the Courts, not knowing the young lawyer, but observing his grasp of principles, the ease with which he led up all his arguments, and the power he had of compelling juries to take, by sympathy as well as by reason, his view of the case, were heard to exclaim, “ the House is the place for him.”

Standing by the ocean as the dark storm-clouds gather over it and the tempest breaks, a man with poetry in his soul feels his spirit exalted and impelled to sing as nature in no other mood can move him: and so, too, looking upon the political storm-clouds gather and darken the sky, if a man have a yearning for the ways of public life, it must be quickened as it can be at no other time. At the date of which we write the air was full of the sounds of political strife, and the clouds deepened and grew more ominous. We cannot wonder if the situation quickened the desires of the young barrister, or if we heard him say, as he glanced through his office window out upon the political scene, where men wrestled and many won prizes for whose abilities he could have no feeling but contempt:

“ Yes, yonder in that stormy sky
I see my star of destiny.”

But it was not known now, nor for some years afterwards, that he looked to a political career. During the elections for the first parliament under the Union the strife was high and confusion general. One day, sitting among friends in his office, Mr. Macdonald said, “ If I were only prepared now I should try for the Legislature,” and then added, “ but it does no harm to wait.” The removal of the theatre of politics to his own city, in 1841, gave impulse to his yearnings for political life; and thereafter he began to equip himself for the sphere in which he longed to move. But he did not, like too many empty young men of our own day, go noising through the country to attract the people’s notice; he did not, indeed, woo the constituency at all, but decided to have the constituency woo him. During the time Parliament sat at Kingston he made the acquaintance of leading public men, and long before it was known that his eye was turned to the paths which they themselves were treading, they prized the friendship and respected the opinions of the young barrister, Macdonald. He attended much to the debates of the House, and many a keen and judicious piece in criticism those who sat with him in the gallery heard fall from his lips. Though he devoted much time to his profession, and was always to be found in his office and ready to take up a case, he was profoundly engaged in preparing himself for his ideal sphere. While most of those who knew him thought his ambitions bent towards legal distinctions only, he was acquiring that knowledge of constitutional, political and parliamentary history, which so early in his public career gave weight to his opinions and standing to himself.

In 1843, in an evil hour, as we have already seen, came over to Canada Sir Charles Metcalfe. The rebellion clouds had rolled away, and the province set out once more, it was hoped, in the ways of political peace; but the new governor-general had no sooner begun to make "his growl heard at the council board" than the political heavens began to grow dark again. Rumours of dissension between the governor and his council began to be whispered abroad, and it was not made a secret that Sir Charles despised and distrusted his council, and had thrown himself into the arms of the Family Compact. We can fancy the feeling among the tribes of animals known as the Seven Sleepers when the genial warmth of spring visits them in their icy abodes: with some such thrill the tories, lying politically dormant, must have received the news that Sir Charles had come to an open rupture with his "rebel advisers" and now sought the confidence and advice of "loyal men."

At this time Kingston was not enamored of her late member, and it was plain that an opportunity was arriving for some one who had the respect and good-will of the constituency. Mr. Harrison, the representative then, was only a make-shift for Mr. Manahan, who had, in the words of an old Kingston newspaper, "sold his constituency to the enemy for a billet for his son-in-law." Young Macdonald now saw his opportunity coming, and so did his friends, for they waited upon him towards the close of the summer of 1843, and invited him to come out for election to the Kingston council. The city had been lately incorporated, and the divisions differed from those of the present, but Macdonald stood for that section which now forms the western part of St. Lawrence Ward. An eye-witness of the election, and a friend of Macdonald, says: "The contest was a fierce one. At every tavern you found crowds of persons drunk and fighting. Capt. Jackson was the candidate against Macdonald, and he had all the noisy and drunken Irishmen in the town on his side. I was passing by one of the booths, and I happened to hear a ruffian of a fellow, named Sullivan, plotting with a large crowd of his own description to go in and prevent Macdonald from speaking, and 'go through' his supporters. They knew me well, and I told them I had my eye upon them. This prevented a great row. I went in, and found everybody inside fairly orderly, for Macdonald had a wonderful way of casting oil on troubled waters." Jackson was overwhelmingly beaten, and a portion of the field, for higher purposes, was won to Macdonald. So in the following year, after the rupture between Metcalfe and his council had come, and the delegation waited upon him and told him they now expected him to take the field against Manahan, Macdonald did not wonder at receiving the call, for he had been long preparing himself for the occasion, and was now ready. Neither did anybody wonder when it was told that he had come into the field, though he had not proclaimed his coming, or talked about it at all, for it was known that there was no one else so capable.

The country was now fairly out of its head, and perhaps it was not strange. A ministry having the confidence of a majority of the people had quarrelled with the governor-general on constitutional questions of vital importance, and resigned. It was a battle between prerogative and the power of the people. In prerogative the tories saw the stability of our institutions, and the maintenance of our connection with the empire. In the power of the people they saw a democracy that to-day might rush into republicanism and to-morrow into chaos. In prerogative the reformers saw the most hateful engine of political oppression, the evil which had convulsed the province in rebellion and blood, a something which was not even a prerogative, but a system by which a large majority of the people were ruled according to the interests of a favoured and irresponsible few. In the power of the people they saw not a privilege but only a birthright, and went to the polls defending that right. While the story of dissensions between the governor and his late ministry was the property of everybody, few seemed to understand the real nature of the issue between them. A large portion of the people believed that Mr. Baldwin and his colleagues had been forcing measures upon the governor that would eventually lead to a separation of Canada from the mother country, and that it was in resisting these encroachments the discord arose. It was told at public meetings, too, long before the elections, that Messrs. Baldwin, Lafontaine and Hincks were aiming at Separation; and all these rumours were susceptible, more or less, of confirmation. The liberal party, while including a vast body of earnest men who aimed only at the establishment of constitutional government, comprised all the blatant demagogues and rebels of the time. Men who were in open hostility to British connection, and who loved anarchy better than order, men who were aforetime American citizens and now longed for annexation, were found upon the reform platforms, each faction proclaiming vehemently its own set of doctrines.

Few, as we have said, at this time really understood what responsible government was, or what had been the issue between the governor and his ministry. But now, as the elections drew near, those before inclined to moderate reform came to think about it, and remembered that some of the men in the late ministry had come thither out of the rebels' camps. They did not wonder that men who six years before were pitted against the soldiers were pitted now against the governor. And during the many months that the autocrat had ruled without a government, ominous mutterings were heard from large bands of the more impatient and radical reformers. They said anarchy had come again, and professed their readiness to take up arms and once more strike for a republic. All this was remembered now, and was yet to be used with tremendous effect by the governor and his party. The question, therefore, by skilful tory arrangement, came to be, not one between conservatives and reformers, as our histories have it, but between the reform party and the crown,—a party who the tories claimed had furnished rebels to the rebellion, who had threatened of late to rebel again, who alarmed the governor with measures which would be fatal to the constitution, and who from their hustings even now were calling for separation. The Crown, in the person of governor Metcalfe, had been outraged by the reformers, and all men who loved peace and British rule were asked to rally round the representative of the Queen.

In a country yet in a crude state of civilization, where the reverential and emotional are the strongest sides to the character of men, we need not wonder how talismanic proved the mention of the Crown. "Next to my God, my king," was the rule of men for over a thousand years, when to touch the hem of the royal garment made the sufferer whole. Aye, and "More than my God, my king," was often the maxim too, and it is avowed us by the statesman-prelate gasping his last in the Abbey of Leicester. It is hard to break the bonds which

“The Queen of Slaves,
The hood-winked angel of the blind, and dead, Custom,” has during a thousand years bound about us. The sword of Alexander cannot cut that woof; but when the man stands up, full of that better light which is purging the world, the thrall snaps easily as the flaxen withes that bound Samson. The blind reverence of the province was aroused at this election; but Sir Charles and the tories said it was the British Lion that was abroad. We fancy they had the lion in the wrong place. The emotional reverence of the people was abroad blind-fold, and not the lion which cowered in his covert. The British lion is not a cruel monster that lives in the closet of a tyrannical king or an autocrat governor, but he is the noble beast that goes abroad and vindicates the rights and the manhood of the people. He was heard at Runnymede, and his roar was louder than the cry of Strafford's butche

The fury was not alone the property of the hustings during this campaign, but it blew a hurricane through the prints as well. Every editor dipped his pen in gall; every column reeked with libel. Those who had no newspapers issued handbills, that might have fired the fences upon which they were posted. Had poor Mr. Potts been in Canada, in the midst of this ink-cyclone, he would have sighed for the tameness of his Eatonswill Gazette. But there was a class of men who considered the poster too low a medium, and the newspaper not high enough for the formal conveyance of their loyalty or the spread of their radicalism, and these flew to the pamphlet. The most noted of the pamphleteers was Rev. Egerton Ryerson, who did not add anything to his reputation for usefulness or integrity by becoming the abject flatterer and slavish defender of Sir Charles Metcalfe. It is pleasing to note, however, one good feature in this questionable transaction.

The governor was grateful, and the following year the doctor was assured the chief superintendency of education for Upper Canada. If in this, though, we find no reparation by the governor for his oppression of the people, we do find in it an excuse for the divine in lending himself to the autocrat. Self-interest is the strongest passion among mortals; and Dr. Ryerson was mortal. His pamphlets are not worth much notice, save for their literary form, which is good, although Hon. A. Mackenzie says in his "Life of George Brown" that it is not good. This hardly amounts to a contradiction, however, as Mr. Mackenzie is not a judge of literary style. The doctor was an accomplished writer, and generally made the most of his material, though he had a passion for running into bombast. He was not satisfied with defending his master on one or two points, but led up his defences in battalions. It was a crushing reply to the charge of autocracy to be told by the reverend defender that Sir Charles was "not a fortune seeker, but a fortune spender," and that he was "good to the poor." Nevertheless, in the governor's cause these pamphlets were as strong as armies, for they were spread among the dissenters, a class outside the charmed circle of the aristocracy, and, hence, stoutly given to reform. They transfigured the governor from a monster "mounted on an elephant, the despotic ruler of oriental slaves," as the fiery and terse Francis Hincks styled him, into a "benevolent man," whose whole life was "an unceasing round of good works." Mr. Sullivan, under the name of "Legion," appeared on the other side with pamphlets which would have been more impressive had they been less flippant.

About this time, Mr. George Brown, a young Scotchman for some time resident in New York, came over to Canada, canvassing for a little weekly newspaper called the British Chronicle, belonging to his father, Peter Brown. He went about among the politicians to see if he could get encouragement to establish a political newspaper. It would have been natural to him to have allied himself with the tories, as both he and his father had been more intensely British and anti-American in New York than Metcalfe had been in Canada. The tories, however, had plenty of organs, and were never over-anxious to share confidence with adventurers. But young Brown was more lucky among the radicals, and the ultimate outcome was the establishment of a new radical organ, the Globe. This paper was launched on the eve of the contest, and at once began the battle with much earnestness. Its style was vigorous but extremely uncouth, and would be rather rough reading in the light of our present newspaper culture. This, however, was not a grievous fault then, for not a very large bulk of its readers enjoyed much more literary culture than the editor himself. Its more serious fault was the frequent crude and undigested form of its thought which was the result of a spontaneous outpouring of impatient and indiscreet enthusiasm. There was no manœuvring in Mr. Brown's advances; he attacked always in charges. It was on seeing his impatience and impetuosity, his lack of tact and the inability "to wait for the morrow till the morrow came," that men said, "Another William Lyon Mackenzie has come amongst us."

Once it is recorded in Holy Writ that in troublous times fierce horsemen were seen riding through the clouds shaking their shields and spears: to those who looked out upon the political sky as the summer of 1844 wore away, and autumn came, the spectacle could have been scarce less full of foreboding. Chaos virtually had come, for the governor had now unlawfully ruled eight months without a constitutional government. Mr. Draper had proved the friend and counsellor of the governor all along; but as August arrived, and yet no progress in forming a ministry had been made, he one day waited upon his excellency and told him he saw grave danger in further delay. Mr. Draper was a tory of a dye almost pre-historic, yet he was a wise man and a patriot. The governor took his sharp and, we may say, imperious advice with wonderful grace for an autocrat, and set himself to work to form a cabinet. Evidently

Mr. Draper had frightened him, for he went hastily at his work, as if he fancied a tempest were shortly to break, and he feared being caught in the storm. In a few weeks it was known that a cabinet had been patched up as follows :

JAMES SMITH	-	-	-	-	Attorney-General, East.
WM. DRAPER	-	-	-	-	Attorney-General, West.
D. B. PAPINEAU	-	-	-	-	Com. of Crown Lands.
WILLIAM MORRIS	-	-	-	-	Receiver General.
M. VIGER	-	-	-	-	President of the Council
DOMINICK DALY	-	-	-	-	Provincial Secretary.

The capture of Mr. Papineau was the most important move the governor had made ; for he was a brother of the notorious agitator and rebel, and his accession to the cabinet fell like a wet blanket upon some of the more radical of the reformers. M. Viger was another French Canadian. He had been a bosom friend of Joseph Papineau, had aided in the rebellion, and been imprisoned for his treason. While lying in the gaol a tory paper had objected to his being "fattened for the gallows." The same journal with other tory organs now pointed to him with pride as a leading representative Canadian, and an honour and a strength to the government. But after all M. Viger was not a man of much consequence. He had not constancy enough in his character to be much of anything. He was a weak rebel and an indifferent patriot. He was on the market when Metcalfe began to play the despot, and was speedily bought up. His absorption into the new cabinet had no effect upon anybody but himself and those who profited by his salary and honors.

But those who knew the old man were moved to sorrow rather than to anger at his defection. "I assure you that no occurrence in my political life," says Robert Baldwin, in a private letter to a gentleman in Kingston, "has ever occasioned me a tenth part of the personal pain than the position which our venerable friend thought proper to assume, has inflicted upon me. . . . I honoured him as a patriot, I loved him as a man, and I revered him as a father. . . . In fact his course is one of those enigmas that baffle me quite in every attempt to unravel it, and I can still really designate it by no other term than an hallucination."

The necessity of appealing to the country went sorely against the governor's grain, but he was assured that there was no hope for the ministry in the existing house. When he found that a dissolution was inevitable, he folded his sleeves for the contest, and stooped to artifices and meanness in forwarding the cause of the tory party to which an average ward politician would hardly descend. He felt however sure of victory. Circumstances stronger than the strength of parties were in his favour; he lacked not the aid of friends who were influential and unscrupulous, and had the satisfaction, above all, to know that his opponents were alienating sympathy by their excesses.

The contest came on in November, in a very hurricane of umult. At more than one hustings blood was shed, and mutual massacre on a general scale only prevented by bodies of soldiers and special constables. The worst fiend known to man was loose in those days during the elections, the demon of whiskey. Near every booth were open houses, where the excited mobs drank intoxicants furnished by the candidates till they became mad. For days before polling, ill-favoured looking persons poured into Montreal, some carrying dirks and slung-shots, and others pistols. Regiments of soldiers, aided by hundreds of special constables, were on constant duty during the elections in this riotous city, but could not prevent some of the most brutal collisions, and even bloodshed. The suspicious strangers with the dirks and pistols did not come into the city for naught; and in the riots gave many a bloody account of themselves.

In Kingston the passions of the mob were scarce less brutal, or party feeling less bitter. Recent sittings of the parliament there had called the staid political principles of the people into activity, and now the crisis which had come fanned that activity into a fierce flame. Some were extreme radicals, who declared at their gatherings that "the British system ought to be pulled out by the roots," others were uncompromising in their toryism, and prayed that Metcalfe "might hold fast, and fight the good fight bravely to the end;" while, perhaps, a party as large as the two extreme ones, took the middle ground, and was neither so radical as the out-and-out reformer, nor so conservative as the ultra tory. To the moderate conservative party John A Macdonald belonged, though when it was told through the streets of Kingston that he was coming to oppose Manahan, the extreme tories, as well as members of the great middle party approved of the choice, and, with ringing cheers, followed the young Alexander of politics to the hustings.

CHAPTER IV.

FROM THE HUSTINGS TO THE HOUSE.

A TORY, however, Mr. Macdonald was, and as a tory he went to the polls. But what he professed was not that slavish toryism which believed that the nation and the people were made only for the sovereign. Neither did he go to the hustings "talking prerogative, the alpha and omega of the compact," but at once came to the political condition of the people. With prerogative, indeed, he did not concern himself at all, unless where it bore on the constitutional status of the province. These were turbulent times in many parts of Upper and Lower Canada, and for several months preceding the elections monster meetings had been held by the party leaders at various parts of the province. It was not unusual to see proceeding to one of these gatherings, a hundred teams, each carrying a dozen stalwart voters to stirring music, with flags flying, and every man armed with a club. Violent collisions often occurred, and the polling places were frequently the scenes of the maddest and most brutal party strife.

Of a similar character were the crowds that gathered at Kingston before the elections were held, some cheering for Mr. Manahan, others for Mr. Macdonald. Manahan was an Irishman, and all the bullies of the city were on his side. The number of these was comparatively small, but they could terrorize over a much larger number of peaceably disposed men. But the election had not proceeded far when the repute of Manahan had grown so odious that his followers began to drop away in flocks. The man's past career, the worthlessness of his moral character and his mean abilities had much to do with this ; but the chief reason was the happy address, the skill and tact of the young lawyer, who opposed him, and who grew from day to day in the good-will of the voters.

Macdonald addressed several meetings in the open air, meetings composed of riotous men, inflamed with whiskey and the worst passions of party. At one of these meetings he had much difficulty in getting an opportunity to begin his speech, as several adherents of Manahan came there to obstruct him. "Never," says an eye-witness, "did he lose temper, but good-naturedly waited till there was a lull in the disturbance." When silence was restored, he said he knew most of the electors, and they were all manly fellows—too manly, indeed, to refuse another fair play. They were opposed to him, he said, and they had a right to be, and he would not give much for them if they would not stand up for their own candidate ; but if they had a right to their opinions—and he would be glad to listen to them at another time—he had also a right to his. He only wished to present his side of the case, and if his hearers did not agree with him they might afterwards vote for whom they chose.

Here was something more than soothing speech ; here, indeed, was the genius of a Mark Antony, that could by the very force of subtle knowledge of character, turn a hostile mob into friends upon the spot. The stroke told, and at every point which appealed to the manliness and fair play of his opponents—for every man, however mean, respects both these qualities—the crowd cheered again and again, and the cheers did not all come from his own friends. It need hardly be said that during his speech there were no more interruptions, and that he had completely conquered his opponents besides charming his friends. A very intelligent Irishman, who had just arrived in Canada, called at Macdonald's office the next day, and said to a student there that he had heard O'Connell the year before making a speech in Kerry. "The speech last night," he said, "was not as forcible as O'Connell's, but it was just as effective." Mr. Macdonald's speeches, however, were far from consisting of sweetness and suavity alone; he had a tongue that could scourge, but it was rarely an unruly tongue. Manahan received more than one castigation before that memorable campaign ended; but the ex-ministry and their party came in for the lion's share. We have already shown that the crisis was one where party feeling was called into fierce activity; that in many places the active tory became a firebrand, and the moderate one a zealot—that hosts of reformers rallied around the governor, and only the most pronounced of the party stood by their guns. We do not wonder at Mr. Macdonald being loud in his cry against the ousted ministry. He had been brought up a conservative, and the young men with whom he first mingled were of the same political school. So, indeed, were nearly all, if not all, of his close friends, up to his entry into public life; and the first chapter of political history he read, in equipping himself for his career, he saw through conservative glasses. It was impossible that he could have been other than a tory, taking into consideration his birth, early training and associations. In and about Kingston everything was on the side of conservatism;—the wealth, the influence, in great measure the intelligence, the social standing, and the prospects. Had Macdonald been the son of a whig father, and grown up in Toronto, instead of Kingston, he might have struck a different chord when he came upon his first platform. But to condemn him for being a tory, as circumstances were, would be to see "an example and a shining light" in the hero in Pinafore, who "might have been a Roosian, a French, or Turk, or Proosian, or perhaps an Italian," but who "in spite of all temptations to belong to other nations," became "an Englishman." Friendly historians, commenting upon Mr. Macdonald's entry into public life, speak of his toryism, not as a set of irresistible opinions, but as if the young politician were troubled with lame back or a club foot, for they considerably describe it as "his misfortune rather than his fault." The fact is, he ought, like Richard the Third, to have come into the world a horrible prodigy, feet first, and bristling with teeth, and instead of crying, as most babies do when first stranded upon this cold and cruel world, begun with a rattling stump speech on Reform. It matters little how John A. Macdonald set out. It is his career in the trying path of public life in which we are interested. If there he did his duty history will be satisfied.

Macdonald did not lack material to incite, from his standpoint, the most scathing speeches. While we all have sympathies with the struggles of a just cause, with the excesses of that cause we cannot have any sympathy. Some of the most brazen demagogues had gone about the country for two years before the election pluming themselves on their disloyalty and the aid they had given to rebellion. They openly declared that henceforth the government should consist of men who had been either rebels in act or in open sympathy. Then many close friends of the ex-government had gone ranting about the country declaring that the government intended to proclaim Canada a republic, and that we had had enough of British connexion. The ex-ministers had to bear the brunt of all this mischievous noise; indeed, they took no pains to repudiate the wild sayings of their followers. Then, during the closing session of parliament, it is said that cabinet secrets were the property of every knot of reform loafers who gathered in the bar-rooms of Kingston. It is undoubted that there was a painful lack of ministerial dignity, and that scores of persons of indifferent social standing enjoyed the confidence of ministers upon council affairs and government measures past and prospective. It was generally believed, too, that the collision between Metcalfe and the executive was less due to a spirit of constitutional unfairness on the part of the governor than to the factious and intolerable attitude of the council. They were, therefore, to blame that the country had gone nine months without a constitutional government, her peace exposed to the gravest dangers. There is no reason why Mr. Macdonald should have believed differently from the large majority of conservatives, and there was no sham scorn, we may be sure, in his denunciations of the lack of ministerial dignity, and the reproaches which he hurled upon the late government for the disloyalty of themselves and their followers.

Taverns were open in Kingston as elsewhere during the contest, and whiskey and blood from cut heads flowed as freely as at Doneybrook Fair. It was impossible for two opposing factions to meet without a collision, and the candidate who escaped violence or gross insult was a man of more than ordinary popularity. It was the custom, too, at some of the public halls where meetings were held, for members of the opposing faction to make a sudden rush and extinguish the lights, when the most indescribable confusion ensued, which ended in the break-up of the meeting. Though this was done during this election at many an assemblage in Kingston, Mr. Macdonald scarcely ever had a noisy interruption at his gatherings. His tact and suavity disarmed hostility, and when he was dealing some of his most effective blows to his opponent, he administered them with such good nature that the listener was reminded of the hero in the song, who "met with a friend and for love knocked him down." Instead of provoking hostility his aim was to disarm it, and this he accomplished while making many a crushing point against his opponents. Every day the contest lasted saw his popularity grow and that of his opponent decrease, till, at length, a day before the polls closed, the latter rushed out of the field in despair, while in the midst of the wildest enthusiasm at the close Mr. Macdonald was carried through the city on a chair, the victor by an overwhelming majority of votes.

There remains little more to be told of the story of poor Manahan. He dropped out of public life a broken man. From stage to stage of the down road to ruin he went; his friends forsook him; his Church cursed him with candle, bell and book, and after he had died from cold and misery; a wretched outcast, she refused Christian sepulture to his remains. Perhaps he rested after all, poor fellow, as comfortably in his little unconsecrated plot as in the shadow of the Roman fan. But Manahan was not a good man. His ways were evil, and like his ways his end.

The country was not proof against a united Compact where all was staked upon the issue; against public money scattered broadcast to debauch constituencies, and a governor-general in his shirt-sleeves pleading for the crown. The result was that the tories were sustained by a majority of three, though the governor-general, in a fit of jubilation, before the returns were all in, wrote a despatch to the colonial secretary, Lord Stanley, setting forth a different result. Forty-six for the government, twenty-eight in opposition, and nine afloat, was his representation. Both the governor and the colonial secretary held that drift-wood went with the current, and unofficially counted the nine in with the forty-eight. This would show a sweeping victory for Sir Charles, and plead trumpet-tongued in justification of his pre-election course. That despatch, however, was false, but it was important. It deceived the home government, and got a peerage for the governor. The session opened with a wrangle over the appointment of a speaker. By a clause of the Union Act, the official use of the French language had been prohibited in the legislature, but with nearly half the members in the house of French origin, it was deemed well by all fair-minded men that the occupant of the chair should know both languages. Two candidates were proposed—Mr. Morin, an ex-Minister, who understood both languages, and Sir Allan MacNab, who understood no language but English, and that not very well. The latter was chosen by a majority of three votes, which showed the strength of parties, and the reckless despatches that governors-general will sometimes write to the colonial office.

The Reform party now held a caucus, at which it was decided that Mr. Lafontaine should introduce resolutions later on in the session, praying the home government to remove the embargo put upon the official use of the French language. In those days governor Metcalfe did not creep about in person to listen at his opponents' doors. He would not be above doing this, however, if the enterprise were a convenient one; but he maintained instead a pimp or a listener at every window and key-hole when the reformers projected a movement which it was his peculiar interest to thwart. In the proposed resolutions of Mr. Lafontaine he saw danger to the French votes he had purchased. Messrs. Viger and Papineau had been bought in the political shambles, it is true, and could be purchased again, but it would be too much even for them to face the storm of obloquy that would follow their support to a government which as a body opposed the resolutions of Mr. Lafontaine. On the other hand, did they and the government as a whole support the resolutions, the French people would ask, Can justice come to us only from opposition? Thus was there a dilemma, one horn not more inviting than the other. The governor, therefore, once again, decided to play the Hindoo. One day, as reform members sat listlessly at their desks, Mr. Papineau arose and moved a set of resolutions praying for the relaxation of restrictions upon an official use of the French language. "Once more has the subtle Indian," whispered Mr. Baldwin to the member who sat beside him, "delved a yard below our mines." No one was astonished now when the cunning or the meanness of the governor came to the surface. There was only the feeling of mortification that he should have been permitted to delve below the mines.

Parliament had no sooner opened than petitions "thick as leaves that strew the brooks at Vallambrosa," began to pour into the house, some setting forth that one member had obtained his seat by the hybrid sin of "bribery and corruption," others that perjured returning officers and partisan magistrates had turned majorities into minorities, and sent the defeated candidate of the government to the legislature. Some of the ministerial supporters affected to disbelieve these charges; others said they were intolerable if true, but not a few coolly maintained that whether they were true or false was of little consequence. The contest had been between rebellious subjects and the authority of the Crown, they said, and in maintaining connection with the glorious mother-land, and subordinating our colonial functions to the jurisdiction of the Fons Honoris and Speculum Justitiæ what their opponents were pleased to call corruption and bribery, they were proud to recognise as loyalty and zeal. It is not, perhaps, to be wondered at that when the Fountain of Honour was spoken of, men looked cynical, and wondered why a governor drinking from that sacred source could do deeds so very dishonourable; and that the Mirror of Justice should reflect those atrocities which had been so long a scourge upon the country. The fact is but too many regarded the fountain as a tainted well, and the mirror as a mirage.

Yet, with all the intriguing of the governor, and the purchaseableness of some members, the government was like a crazy ship that creaked under the pressure of every squall, and gave promise of going to pieces in the first storm. And the old ship's position was made worse by the helplessness of the crew in the lower house, who seemed to be navigating their way through all the shoals that surrounded them without captain or compass. The captain, Mr. Draper, was in the legislative council, and could no more preserve unity and concord among his followers below than a mother could rule a family in the basement while she kept to the attic. It would give much scandal to the conservative of this day who prizes loyalty to his party as not among the least of the political virtues to walk back fifty years into the ages, and from the gallery of the Canadian assembly see the discords and disloyalty of the conservative party then. No day passed during which some prominent reformer did not ask a question which set the hearts of the headless party there palpitating. Sometimes the question was answered parrot fashion, or with that hesitation with which an errand boy repeats over the message of the sender. But the chief reply was that the government was either considering, or would "consider the matter," though the visible government, it came soon to be understood, was only a sort of Mr. Jorkins, and the real government Mr. Draper. Sometimes, indeed, a minister would burst "from vulgar bounds with brave disorder," and answer an undecided question upon his own responsibility. But woe speedily overtook him, for he was snubbed before the house ere he had well settled into his chair, by a brother councillor. If he had any retort in him, a scene generally ensued that scandalized the party and set the opposition chuckling. The governor's spies made notes of all these indiscretions and duly reported them. When the situation at length became intolerable it was decided that the head of the Family should come down stairs. In the early part of February, therefore, Mr. Draper published a card soliciting the suffrages of the people of London, asking them to reiterate their intention now "to support the government of Sir Charles Metcalfe." Fancy Sir John A. Macdonald, at this day, going up to the Forest City and asking the people to reiterate their intention to support "the government of Lord Lorne!" The impartiality of the governor's character, we fear, would scarcely be an offset to the offence. And having spoken in one breath of the government of Sir Charles Metcalfe, in the next Mr. Draper uttered this lumbering sentence: "I am determined not to retain office under responsible government under circumstances which would cause a minister of the Crown in Great Britain to resign." The Londoners swallowed Mr. Draper, contradictions and all, and the government was saved for the time.

The faces of several prominent members of the old house were missed from their places in the new Mr. Francis Hincks was defeated in Oxford, but instead of playing Othello, he at once turned his great energies and ability to his newspaper, the Pilot, which he had established a few months before in Montreal. The Pilot thereafter till the downfall of the Government was the greatest newspaper power in the land.

John S. Cartwright, too, an uncompromising Conservative, who probably believed that the rain would refuse to fall and the corn to spring in a reform country, and that east winds and every description of bad weather were sent by Providence upon the reformers, was also missing from his place. It is not recorded, however, that the earth ceased spinning, or the sun to shine the day he stepped out of the political sphere.

The faces of many members destined to play a prominent part in political life were seen there for the first time. Among these were Mr. Ogle R. Gowan, the fiery Orangeman, Joseph Edouard Cauchon, on whose political ægis there yet appeared no tarnish, and, above all the rest in ability and promise, the member for Kingston, Mr. John A. Macdonald.

CHAPTER V.

DRAUGHTS FROM TORY FOUNTAINS.

THE session, as we have seen, commenced with much wrangle, and all the batteries of the opposition, who possessed the heaviest guns, were opened upon the government. Nearly every member who "could talk" took some part in assault or defence; but Mr. Macdonald sat unmoved at his desk while the fray went on, "looking," says a gentleman who remembers having seen him there, "half careless and half contemptuous. Sometimes in the thick of the mêlée, while Mr. Aylwin acted like a merry-andrew, and Colonel Prince set his Bohemian lance against members indiscriminately, Macdonald was busy in and out of the parliamentary library. I scarce ever remember seeing him then about the house that he was not searching up some case either then impending or to come up at a later date. He was for a great part of his time, too, buried in a study of political and constitutional history." With Mr. Macdonald we have already seen the faculty to conciliate and harmonize contending factions was born, as well as assiduously cultivated; and we may be sure he had no little contempt for a ministry which every day paraded the mutual jealousies and antagonisms of its members before their opponents and the public. This, indeed, was the very reason why he abstained, with not a little silent scorn, from engaging in the debates; this is why he chose rather to store his mind with knowledge that would endure, while others wrangled or played the merry-andrew.

Some, who see a similarity in life and character from the resemblance of two locks of hair, have employed themselves in drawing parallels in these later years between the subject of this biography and a young politician who had now begun to attract attention in another parliament, that one reading the portrayals could think of nothing but Martin and "the other Martin" in "The Two Dianas." At the time of which we write, Mr. Disraeli had published books and got into parliament, but had shone with an uncertain light which so much resembled a will-o'-the-wisp that no man would have cared to follow it. With an overmastering love of Oriental display, to him a suit of clothes was of more moment than a set of principles, while the particular cut of a myrtle-green vest transcended in importance the shape given to a bill of reform. "Clothes," he tells us by the mouth of Endymion, when his race was nearly run, "do not make the man, but they have a great deal to do with it." But there was in the beginning, and indeed to the end, little resemblance between the two, as we shall see in the progress of our story.

The young member who has the affliction of being "smart" is generally as great a nuisance as the boy coming home from high school, to whom all knowledge is a novelty; but Mr. Macdonald was as reserved as the staidest veteran in that whole house. He assumed no airs when he arose to speak, and never attempted dramatic or sentimental flights, as did the man to whom he has been likened, in the outset of his career. He never spoke merely for the purpose of talking, but only when that which he had to say threw more light upon the discussion, added force to an attack, or strength to the defence. It is not uninteresting to note that the beginning of his long executive career was his appointment on the 12th of December, 1844, to the standing orders committee. On the 21st of December there was much turmoil in the assembly. During the elections held at Montreal, owing to the corrupting facilities in the hands of the government, Hon. Geo. Moffatt and Mr. C. S. De Bleury had been returned to the legislature. One Peter Dunn, and others, accordingly drew up a petition setting forth the irregularities of the election, and Mr. Aylwin, a reformer, and a gentleman possessing a most flippant and annoying tongue, moved that the election of the two members be declared void. The solicitor-general, Mr. Sherwood, held that the petition was insufficient, inasmuch as it was not competent to any person, not an elector at the time of the election, to petition against a member's return, and that the law in Lower Canada required that ten of the persons signing such a petition should take an oath declaring their right to vote under the Act. But this petition omitted to show these vital points, for which reason it was not a valid subject for legislative action. Mr. Aylwin, in a deluge of words, said the government was unnecessarily tied to technicalities. Mr. Baldwin, the leader of the reformers, said the mere technical question with respect to qualification was entitled to no weight. The question now was not whether the acts alleged in Dunn's petition were true or false, but whether the legal formalities had been observed which Lower Canada required. "Will any one tell me," quoth Mr. Baldwin, "that if I had only obtained my elective franchise yesterday, I am not interested in the manner in which the town or country where I reside is represented?" Then Mr. Baldwin folded his coat and sat down. Up to this time the young Kingston member had uttered no word in the house save yea or nay. Many members had heard of the clever Kingston lawyer who defended Shoultz, and overwhelmed Manahan, but he had sat there so unobtrusively at his desk that many thought, really, but little about him, regarding him as a quiet, lawyer-like politician, who seemed very industrious—for he was always reading or searching books—and that was all. Now he arose, cool and collected, to put an old member right; not, indeed, some indifferent member, but the renowned Mr. Baldwin, with whom few, save the "know-nothing, fear nothing," members of the government would care to have measured swords. He glanced first at the speaker, then at the leader of the opposition. In "reply to that gentleman's observations he would say that the hon. gentleman was mistaken in supposing that the law did not require parties petitioning to be resident at the place where the elections took place, and that if they afterwards became residents it would be sufficient. The hon. and learned member for Quebec did not adopt that line of argument because he saw that it was an unsound one. The whole of the argument upon the subject used by Sir William Follett, which had been referred to, was sustained, and it was a principle not only of law, but of common sense, that parties not residing at the place of election cannot be aggrieved by the return. It could not be contended that they had sustained a wrong, and it would be out of their power to make the affidavit, required by the statute. The first ground of objection was not answered in any way, because the law of Lower Canada on this point was the same as the law of England, and the arguments used must apply with equal force in the one case as in the other. The second ground of objection was equally unanswerable. It was true that the magistrate had taken upon himself to state that the oath which had been taken was according to law, but the house was the only competent judge as to whether the oath had been so administered. It seemed to him, therefore, upon these grounds that the petition could not be supported; and to settle the precedent he would move that the further consideration of the question be deferred until the 11th day of January next."

A writer who draws an amusing picture of the phoenix-like member for Megantic, Mr. Daly, and a not flattering portrait of Mr. Sherwood, was present in the house when Mr. Macdonald made his first speech. He tells us that "when Mr. Macdonald stood up to reply to the contentions of the opposition, he addressed the house with as much ease as if speaking there were nothing new to him. He had an air of confidence, and was as truly master of his subject as if he had been prime minister. Every eye was upon the young member as he spoke, and as I saw the respectful attention that was paid to him, I felt proud of Kingston." This gives us an idea of the manner of Mr. Macdonald on first addressing the house, but the speech itself tells us a much fuller story. It is not often that the beginner in fence courts conflict with a master of the sword. It is not often that a young politician, standing up for the first time in parliament, courts issue with a veteran, the leader of a great party, and a debater against whom none save the reckless would have cared to match himself. But this weight in his opponent was the very incentive that hurried Macdonald to the conflict. He had sat since the opening of the house silent, often with scorn upon his lips, while a series of little tempests raged about him, till now, he saw an opportunity to worst the greatest opponent on the other side, to end a wrangle, and establish a precedent. It is not to be wondered at that the austere reformer glanced darkly from under his brows at this young man whom he had not seen till yesterday, who now stood up coolly rebuking him and exposing his errors, as if the ex-minister were the novice, and the novice the veteran. But the speaker spoke on indifferently. For days he had heard the house wrangle about these Montreal seats, and now he felt the time had come when the brawling ought to cease. He had looked for some member of the government to end the turmoil, but had looked in vain. The spirit of confusion had taken the bit in its teeth, and the government was completely at its mercy. What old heads had failed to do, at last he did. He made a motion that at once brought the barren strife to an end, and established a precedent. His motion ended the disorder, and the house set free, proceeded with its work. It is doubted by no one now that both Messrs. De Bleury and Moffatt won their seats through fraud and perjured instruments, but it was not Mr. Macdonald's aim or concern to shield them in their ill-got places. To reach them was made impossible by a fatal informality in Dunn's petitions. His speech was a triumph for higher reasons—a different speech from the first flight taken by the gaudy young statesman in the British commons.

From this time on to the first of February, we meet not his name again in the mass of verbiage that flowed from the House. His silence during this period and the following session has been much commented on, but we have already seen that during a great portion of his time, while the wrangling went on, he sat with bent head at his desk, poring over a book, or was found searching, or making memoranda in the library. But we suspect he was as deeply engaged in another direction; that then began the system of personal influence upon political associates which has been such an important factor in the secret of his success as a party leader. With most men noise is one of the necessary accompaniments of advancement, but with him it was different then as it has been since. He did not gain the attention and admiration of the conservative party by sounding his trumpet; and later on, when he entered the cabinet, he went in, so to speak, in his stocking-feet. Neither did he accomplish this in the fashion of a Machiavelli, but was sought after upon merits he had manifested without intrigue or display, and through a system of what we must regard as something higher than mere tact, as indeed an art born in him with his birth, and a phase of only the rarest genius.

On the first of February, Mr. Roblin introduced a Bill providing for the proper distribution of intestate property in Upper Canada. He set forth that the law of primogeniture was an evil tree to set growing in our country; and drew a touching picture of an expiring father dying intestate, whose baby son wondered at all the faces gathered about his papa's bed. Would the house believe, Mr. Roblin asked, that the father was less anxious for the welfare of this infant son thrown upon the cold world, than for the oldest son who might have reached the years of manhood? He therefore believed that what Canada wanted was gavelkind. Such was the law in Kent, and under it the children of the intestate inherited in equal proportions. Mr. Baldwin believed that the Bill was very defective, but as the people of Upper Canada desired it, he would vote for it.

Mr. Baldwin had no sooner sat down, than the provokingly cool young lawyer from Kingston rose again ; once more looked at the Speaker, and from the Speaker to the leader of the opposition ; then told " Mr. Speaker " that he " heard with surprise and regret the hon. member for the fourth riding of York, after declaring that the system now attempted to be introduced was open to great objections, state his intention to support it. He had, indeed, always persuaded himself that the hon. gentleman's motto was 'Fiat justitia ruat cælum.' He would vote for a measure which he knew to be defective and declared to be a bad one, simply because he had taken it into his head that the people of Upper Canada required it.

. . . . How did he know they did require it? There were but two legal and parliamentary ways of ascertaining what were the opinions of the people, petitions and public meetings, and there had been neither of these in its favour. . . . It was folly to raise a monarchical structure upon a republican foundation. . . . The measure ought not to be introduced here for the very reason that it was adopted in the United States. . . . It violated the laws of political economy, and was calculated to make the poor poorer ; to make that which was a comfortable farm-house in one generation a cottage in the second, and a hovel in the third. They had heard that primogeniture was a son of toryism, but surely they would accept the dicta of Blackwood's Magazine, a journal not much tied to toryism, against the cutting and carving up. . . . It was the younger sons of England that had made her great in peace or war. What would have been the younger Pitt and Fox if instead of being sent forth to seek their fortunes, the estates of their fathers had been divided? They would have been mere country squires. It was fortunate for the Duke of Wellington and for his country that he was left with his sword in his hand, and that sword all he had."

We do not quote these extracts in admiration of all their doctrines, but to show how deftly the young politician could turn away the point of an opponent's argument, and that opponent in the right; and how he had yet to escape from his strong tory shell. How ashamed of him his party would now be to hear him from his place in the Dominion parliament defend what Gibbon calls the "insolent prerogative of primogeniture." How ashamed of him his party and the country now would be to hear him oppose a measure here "for the very reason that it was adopted in the United States." But these opinions, held for some years later, were as the vapours that hang about the face of the morning, but which are purged away as the strength of the day advances.

We know that Mr. Macdonald's public life has been described as "a series of contradictions," but in what statesman do we find "the morning song and evening song always correspond?" Mr. Gladstone, the very fountain of liberal virtues and greatness, for years after his first appearance in public life, bore the nickname of "Pony Peel," and was regarded as an "Oxford bigot," before the better light began to dawn upon him. Because his father owned slave plantations in Demerara, he took ground upon negro emancipation that will not give a halo to his picture; he opposed Jewish emancipation, the reform of the Irish Church, the endowment of Maynooth, and several other just and liberal measures. He began his public career, in short, not only as an obstructive tory, but as a narrow bigot. Yet we see not even the bitterest tory organ in England describe his career as "a series of contradictions," though it has been far more contradictory than John A. Macdonald's. Mr. Disraeli, during all the time he was prominently before the public, was regarded at worst, as a sort of fantastic tory, yet strange and contradictory was his beginning. He began as a visionary radical, and formed one of the joints in O'Connell's tail; in his earlier books he evoked a clapping of hands from reformers by his advocacy of free trade; but won party leadership by becoming the champion of protection. In "Lothair" he sneered at the aristocracy, and then knelt before its shrine. He denounced it as a "Venetian oligarchy," and then described it as comprising "the dignified pillars upon which order and liberty rest." Yet in after years when the mantle of rule descended upon him, even his opponents forgot these things, for they had been done and said when there was neither responsibility nor experience.

A man is not born wise, but the way to wisdom lies open to every man, and he is furnished with a light to guide him by that way, and that light the understanding. If he falter by the way or turn into the crooked bye-paths, then does he become accountable to his fellow men and receive the judgment of history. A man who first sets foot in the bewildering paths of public life is like unto one who has just begun to learn a trade. Experience is his school, and there must be many a defective blow dealt, many a wrong step made before the apprentice comes out a master of his craft. We have no training schools unfortunately where we can send candidates for public life, but are obliged to accept the unfit and unready, and leave them to learn their trade while they are doing our journeymen work! It is not surprising that the "botches" seen in our legislative halls are so many and the handicraft often so very bad. Neither, unfortunately, is it always the ablest and most suitable students in the political trade that we send at the political journey-work; but often men of a low intellectual stamp, who never read a suitable book in their lives, who know nothing and really care less about great political questions, and whose passport to public favour is joviality in the bar-room or at the billiard table, and the ability to talk blatant vulgarity on the "stump" at election times. Few of the really worthy men, those who watch the trend of events, who read and think, can be induced to enter into a field so degraded, but retire away to their libraries; though probably, if one of these men did come, he would find himself distanced far in the race by some demagogue who excelled him in drinking beer, driving fast horses, and "treating" friends in the saloons. We have a legion of reformers in this country, but will some of them not come forward and begin to reform here? As well may they wrangle with the winds as many of the questions against which they have set their lances. If the people, after hearing both sides of a plain question, put with clearness and force, decide to have N. P. or N. C., let them have it. It is they alone who are concerned. But the question of the intellectual and moral capacity of the candidate for legislative place touches the root of the whole political system. If you elect to represent you a man with a low moral character, depend upon his turning corruptionist if he get the chance; and it is but too often the case, in all parts of our Dominion, that a man who has no moral or social standing, and who has failed at everything else—in commerce, in law, in medicine, and not unfrequently in divinity—turns politician, sells himself to the highest bidder, and ever afterwards makes it the aim of his life to get all of the public funds he can, welcoming the means, whatever their character, to that end.

Well, Gladstone and Disraeli were not exceptions in being "off with the old love." Peel, who began his career as a tory of the tories, was not struck with the light till two years after Mr. Macdonald had entered public life, and then suddenly announced to the house that he had changed his mind on the whole subject of protection, on the policy that he had advocated all his life, and was now converted to a belief in free trade. Yet history relates the change without discredit to his memory, although it came when he was in his fifty-eighth year, the very meridian of his powers. Only a few days ago a noble lord, whose toryism had been pronounced, and who fought side by side with Disraeli in many a pitched battle against Gladstone, entered the great liberal's cabinet as colonial secretary. And really the tories whom he deserted had less to say about the defection of the distinguished peer than some of our critics about the utterances of a student politician delivered during a reign of political chaos, and in the twilight of opinion. We are not apologizing for inconsistency here, but justifying a wholesome and honest change of opinion. It would be an evil principle that required a legislator to oppose the adoption of the locomotive because, before the introduction of the steam engine, he had favoured the stage coach. No; tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis. For the remainder of the session, Mr. Macdonald sat unconcernedly at his desk, save when he arose to make a motion or introduce a measure. He had not grown less contemptuous for his opponents or warmer towards his friends; but sat there waiting, with cool philosophy, for that tide to come, which, "taken at the flood leads on to fortune." Once indeed, on the 20th of February, he was aroused from his indifference by a wrangle which seemed to be interminable. Mr. Aylwin had persisted in interrupting Mr. Moffatt till he was named from the chair. But beyond the naming, no one on either side seemed to know how to proceed. Sir Allan was nonplussed, ministers looked on bewildered, leading reform members arose only to add to the confusion, while the merry-andrew who had raised the squall, bandied words defiantly with the house and the chair, seeming to say in effect, "I have been named; here I am; what are you going to do with me?" While the house sat puzzled and confounded, there was a movement at a quiet desk, and the cool member for Kingston arose. He looked around the confused house, and from the house to the chair. "The member for Quebec has been named," he said; "he might now explain the cause of his being called to order after which he must withdraw." And he took his seat. The words threw light upon the house but a formality was yet needed. Aylwin still kept the floor, hurled abuse indiscriminately, and defied the chair. Members looked from one to the other, and many eyes were turned to the desk of the member for Kingston. Again he arose. "As the member for Quebec chooses to continue in the same strain, I move that he withdraw." This punctured the bubble, and Mr. Aylwin apologized. The incident goes to show the cool promptitude of the young politician, when others who must have understood the formalities, in the confusion, had forgotten them.

It was hoped by Sir Charles that the appearance of Mr. Draper in the lower chamber would secure the harmony of the members, but the tendency was to disruption instead of cohesion. With a loud flourish Mr. Draper had stated in the beginning of the session that the government would stand or fall with the University Bill; with cynical faces the opposition saw him bring the measure down; saw his supporters shrink away; saw him eat the leek, withdraw the Bill upon the second reading, do everything, in short, but keep his word and resign. They remembered, too, that only a few weeks before he had told the people of London that he would not retain office under circumstances that would oblige a British minister to yield up the seals.

At this date, it appears, the conscience of Sir Charles Metcalfe began to sting him, in proportion as his government lost ground he exerted himself by art and wile to prop it up, till, eventually, as his biographer tells us, he began to fear that he had lowered his honour, and appeared to himself somewhat of a trickster. But, though he had degraded his high office, the home government considered he had done his duty well, and wrote to him that he had been ennobled. It is not surprising that when an address was moved in the legislature, felicitating him on his honours, many a member said that he could not congratulate either Baron Metcalfe or the House of Lords; and that instead of being honoured with gauds and title he ought to have been recalled and tried for high crimes and misdemeanors. If the denunciation was extravagant, it was certainly not without its excuse.

Shortly after the prorogation of parliament a destructive fire broke out in Quebec, consuming 1,650 dwellings, two churches, a ship-yard and several lumber yards. Nearly 2,000 persons were turned penniless and adrift upon public charity. Assistance rapidly poured in from every quarter, and the governor-general, who took active measures in soliciting subscriptions, generously headed the list with $2,000.

The end of poor Metcalfe's mortal career was drawing close to him now. His old malady, cancer in the face, had broken out afresh, and was dragging him down remorselessly to the grave. They sent out a physician from the colonial office with a sovereign wash* for the disease, but the patient was beyond the reach of human skill. During the early winter he crossed the Atlantic to his seat at Basingstoke and died there. It is said that in private life he was kind and courteous, and good to the poor; and that many a tear was shed to his memory. His epitaph was written by Macaulay, who makes the marble tell posterity that, "In Canada, not yet recovered from the calamities of civil war, he reconciled contending factions to each other and to the mother country," and that "costly monuments in Asiatic and American cities attest the gratitude of the nations he ruled." This, however, only lessens our faith in epitaphs. It proves, too, that Byron was not all astray when he told us in the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," not to " Believe a woman or an epitaph,

Or any other thing that's false."

It was during the spring of this year that the gallant commander Sir John Franklin sailed away with high hopes from England to meet his death among the thunders of ice in the dismal North. Thereafter it was that many a whaling crew at night in Northern bays sang while the tempest howled and icebergs rumbled the touching song,

In Bantling Bay while the whale blows,
The fate of Franklin no one knows; * * *

and told, how, often in the wierd light of the aurora borealis the brave commander and two of his company, clad in white, were seen gliding swiftly by bound for the frozen pole.

CHAPTER VI.

THE LIGHTS OF '44.

WILLIAM HENRY DRAPER, whose commanding presence and sweet silvery voice would attract anybody who visited the gallery of the legislature, was born in London, England, in 1801. His father was rector of a High Episcopal Church there, but the son yearning for adventure left the parsonage when a mere lad and entered as a cadet on board an East Indiaman. Here he had plenty of the adventure that falls to the middy's share, but tiring of the "floating palace," as Marryat describes the East Indiamen of those days, and even the allurement of a tiger hunt in the jungle after the voyage, the young rover, in his twentieth year, reached Canada, and settled down to the less romantic employment of teaching school in Port Hope. But this new occupation was only a stepping-stone and did not detain him long. He studied law and was called to the bar, taking up his residence in Toronto or what was then known as Little York. In 1836 Toronto elected him to the legislature of Upper Canada, and the following year, at the invitation of Sir Francis Bond Head, he took a seat in the executive without a portfolio. During the battle of smoke at Gallows' Hill he was an aide-de-camp to the governor; became solicitor-general in 1837, and attorney-general in 1840, succeeding, to the latter office, Hon. Christopher A. Hagerman. Mr. Draper was a tory. He staunchly upheld the union of Church and State, but did not consider that any church, save his own, had the right to an official existence. Dear to him, above every feature of government, was the prerogative of the Crown, which he looked upon as a constitutional safeguard, never indeed regarding it as a tyrannical engine, even when it kept the majority under its heel and demitted the governing power to the minority. Yet, according to the light he had upon political liberty, he was a good man, and loved his country well. The fact is, he regarded "popular rights" as a doctrine so full of evil, that, it would, if granted, undermine our stately systems and plunge the whole governmental fabric into ruin. As all good and thoughtful men to day regard the doctrines of communism, so did he regard the principles of the reformers. During many a year he was a brake upon the great-rolling wheel of progress, but in his obstruction saw only the duty of the patriot. He possessed a graceful form and a commanding presence; and when he addressed a jury, in his earlier years, or his fellow legislators in later life, so rich and courtly was his eloquence, so sweet and insinuating were the tones of his voice, that he won for himself the name of "Sweet William." He had a subtle knowledge of human nature, an inexhaustible fund of tact when beset by difficulties to mollify opponents, and "make the worse appear the better reason"; yet he never had a large personal following, and could not hold together the incongruous elements of the cabinets he led. It is not as a politician that he endures in our memory now, but as the justice of the dignified presence and silvery voice that for thirty years adorned the bench with his high character and great judicial insight. He died on the 3rd of November, 1877, being then in his 77th year, regretted for his lofty character and great abilities.

Robert Baldwin, the great Reformer, and son of Dr. William Warren Baldwin, of Summer Hill, Cork, Ireland, was born at Toronto in 1804. In 1789 his father and grandfather emigrated to this country and settled in the township of Clarke, Ontario, but removed afterwards to Toronto, where young Dr. Baldwin betook himself to the dual profession of law and medicine, practising both for a time, and the law exclusively in later years, with marked success. About six months before his death, which occurred in 1844, he was called to the legislative council of Canada. In 1825 Robert, who was now twenty-one years, entered upon the practice of law with his father, and the firm was thereafter known as "Baldwin & Son." In 1829 a vacancy occurred in the representation of York, by the resignation of Chief Justice Robinson, and Robert Baldwin was called out by the liberals to oppose the candidate of the Family Compact, Mr. Small. Young Baldwin, like his father, was opposed to the outrageous system of government which then prevailed, and being of a singularly lofty and honourable character, and of marked ability, his entry into the field of politics created much attention. It was a time surely to fire any man who had in him the love of fair play, and could rise above personal or class interests. Of the twelve years from 1824 to 1836, the government was in a minority in the popular branch for eight years, a fact which some of the tories declared at the time to be "annoying, but not of much consequence." Mr Baldwin was elected despite the array of government strength he found in the field; and on his entry into the house at once began to assail the odiousness of the existing system. In 1836 he went to England, and while there sought an interview with the colonial secretary, Lord Glenelg; but that languid gentleman, who reminds one of Frederick Fairlie in the "Woman in White," refused to see him, though he was good enough to intimate that he would attend to communications in writing upon the subject. Mr. Baldwin's efforts availed little then, but the principles for which he strove were soon to triumph. The report of Lord Durham not long afterwards, which set the tory world aghast, was a powerful auxiliary. In 1840 Mr. Baldwin became solicitor-general under Mr. Draper, with the approval of the reform party, and the year following the union was appointed attorney-general for Canada West. This position he retained till the meanness and tyranny of governor Metcalfe forced himself and his party to resign office and make way for a government by the minority. We may as well anticipate the remainder of his career. He remained in opposition till 1848, when he again became leader of the government, which position he retained till 1851. At this period he bade farewell to public life, retiring full of honours, and surrounded by affluence, to his seat at Spadina, Toronto. Here he died on December 9th, 1858. Throngs of people from every surrounding part streamed in to his funeral, to attest their love and respect for this good and noble-minded statesman.

Robert Baldwin married a sister of the late Hon. Edward Sullivan, who bore him several children. One of these entered the church, and another went to sea, while a daughter married Hon. John Ross. Mr. Baldwin was somewhat above the middle stature, of stout build, and slightly stooped at the shoulders. As a speaker he was not captivating, but he was convincing, for every sentence seemed to come from a deep well of conviction; and though he hesitated as he spoke, and broke and marred his sentences, his aims were so noble and so good that he always received the profound attention and respect of his auditors. In disposition he was mild and affable, but he could not woo popular favour by the smaller arts which, in many men, are the passport to popularity. Yet he was neither cold nor formal, and all who came to know him closely were captivated by the sweet sincerity of his character. We have seen a private letter that he wrote to a friend in Kingston, who had decided to enter political life, and from it we gather that he was not enamoured of the public sphere. "I confess," he says, "was I to put public interest out of the question, it would be more the part of a private friend to wish that you might be disappointed, for politics are certainly a most thankless and profitless occupation. Do what one will, sacrifice what one may, and his conduct is misrepresented and his motives maligned, and the only consolation left is the consciousness of having done one's duty." Well is it with the statesman who, opening his heart, can say that he has done his duty. Well has it been with the high-minded, the good Robert Baldwin.

One of the most remarkable men in appearance and ability in the house was Mr. Louis Hypolite Lafontaine. He was a son of Antoine Menard Lafontaine, who had been a member of the parliament of Lower Canada from 1796 to 1804, and was born at Boucherville, in October, 1807. He began life as a barrister, and applied himself diligently to his profession, accumulating a handsome fortune. When the oppressions of the little British clique became intolerable, he was found among the daring young spirits at whose head was Papineau, who met to discuss ways of throwing off the hateful yoke. Later on he became the rival of Papineau, and put himself at the head of la jeune France; "and the priests shook their heads at his orthodoxy." He was on the search for liberty then and often hinted at throwing off the "ecclesiastical fetters" as well as the yoke of the Compact. In 1837 he fled the country from a warrant for high treason, passed over to England, and thence, in some trepidation, silently slipped across the Channel to France. There was no evidence against him, however, and an ironical letter he had written to Mr. Girouard on the absurdity of rebellion was taken literally, and went far towards removing him even from suspicion. His little tour had a wonderful effect upon him, for he came back, not only a good loyalist, but a pious Christian. He went to mass ostentatiously, frequented the sacraments, and muttered his Ave Marias aloud. The priests killed the fatted calf on his return, and he became a pet and a light of Holy Church. In 1842 he reached the goal of his political ambition, by being called to the cabinet as attorney-general East, but the next year, with his colleagues, fell a victim to the snares of the governor-general, and resigned. In 1848, when the tory fabric tumbled down, he again came in as attorney general East, which position he retained till 1851. Two years later he was appointed Chief Justice to the Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, and in 1854 was created a baronet of the United Kingdom. He was married twice, first to Adèle, only daughter of A Berthelot, advocate, of Lower Canada, and secondly to a widowed lady of Montreal. He left no issue.

Mr. Lafontaine was a man of a very commanding appearance. He had a strikingly handsome face and a magnificent forehead which was said to resemble strongly that of Napoleon the First. "He was not," says the writer of Washington Sketches, "an eloquent speaker, his utterances being thick and guttural, and his English, though good in structure, bad in pronunciation." He was a close and very decided reasoner, never losing his temper; but having formed many of his ideas arbitrarily from books he was tied to theories and dogmatical. He frequently showed a passion for the impracticable in politics, and was vain of his knowledge of the British constitution, of which one keen critic at least, said he knew nothing. He was an honourable opponent, but his resentments were as undying as his attachments. In his judicial capacity he excelled, and down to his death added a lustre to the dignity and efficiency of the Bench.

The Speaker of the Assembly, the Hon. Sir Allan Napier MacNab was born at Niagara, in 1798. While a lad at school the Americans attacked Toronto, and he was "one of a number of boys selected as able to carry a musket."* The lad then entered the ship of Sir James Yeo, where he was rated as a midshipman, and accompanied the expedition to Sacket's Harbor and other points. Promotion being slow on ship-board, he joined the 100th Regiment in which he saw some service, and subsequently entered upon the study of law. In 1825 he was called to the bar, and some months afterwards began to practice his profession in Hamilton. Up to this period he had been a victim of impecuniosity, having been "compelled to restrict his perambulations within the charmed circles of the blue posts which in these times marked the boundary that must not be passed by a bailed debtor."†

In 1829 he was elected to parliament for Wentworth, having created sympathy for himself among the tories. He was speaker of the last parliament held in Upper Canada, and when the rebellion broke out hastened from Hamilton to Toronto with his men of Gore, and dispersed the deluded band that Mackenzie had gathered about him at Montgomery's tavern. Later in the year, he ordered the cutting out of the Caroline, which was surrendered to Niagara Falls. We have already seen that he was chosen by the tories as speaker of the second parliament under the Union. We shall meet his figure again, all important with its gauds of honour, and shall not anticipate his career. He was not of much consequence as a politician. He had a good presence and could make a ready speech, but he lacked all the essentials of an orator, and the tact that charms one's friends and mollifies his enemies. Though his speech was jagged and often lumbering, he was always drawn up in the order of battle, ready to level a lance against any opponent, whether he knew his mettle or not, or to rush into the most intricate question that he knew nothing about. Sir Allan would have been a better man had they not spoiled him with their gauds and knighthood. It is not every man who is equal to the carrying of a ribbon or a star, or a C. M. G. to his name. Sir Allan was not. The moment that the title fell upon him, his usefulness departed; he seemed to feel that he had been absorbed by the Crown, and drawn out of the coarser and unholy atmosphere of common life in which he had formerly lived. Henceforth his duty was to guard faithfully the interests of that Crown of which he felt himself a part. Prosperity and honours are often convincing tests of a man. They are what fire is to the metals. From the ordeal only the gold issues unchanged. And,

Hearts that the world in vain have tried,
 And sorrow but more closely tied;
 That stood the storms when waves were rough,
 Yet in a sunny hour, fell off,
 Like ships that have gone down at sea,
 When heaven was all tranquillity.

Dominick Daly, the son of Dominick Daly, by the sister of the first Lord Wallscourt, was born in Galway, Ireland, in 1798, and married in his twenty-eighth year the second daughter of Colonel Ralph Gore, of Barrowmount, County Kilkenny. He studied law, was, in due time, called to the bar; but not caring for the legal profession, came out as secretary with governor Burton to Quebec. Shortly after his arrival he became provincial secretary for Lower Canada; and on the accomplishment of the Union became provincial secretary for Canada, and a member of the board of works, with a seat in the council. He retained the provincial secretaryship till 1848, when he was driven out of office by the reformers. He sat in gloomy state three years longer for Megantic, and then betook himself to England where he petitioned the government for a substantial recognition of his twenty-five years' faithful service in Canada. In answer to his prayer he was appointed successively to the governorship of Tobago, Prince Edward Island, and Western Australia, and received a knighthood. If ever henchman deserved reward at the hands of the Crown, Dominick Daly did. His idea of political duty was to show unswerving fealty to the Crown, and support every government that came to power. He was a body upon which the political sun never set. When a government, of which he was a member waxed strong, Dominick became full of party sinew and vitality; but as that party waned and the end drew near, the colour faded out of him; he became a sort of political jelly-fish, and calmly awaited the change of parties, when he developed new affections, a new frame, and fresh marrow and muscle. Like Mejnour of the Rosy Cross, he saw rulers come and go, and parties wax and wane, and fall to pieces, and rally and grow great again; but time nor change affected him. In the best of nature he assisted the successor of Burton and his clique to thwart and oppress the French majority; and he aided Durham in laying the broad foundation of an enduring liberty. He strove with Sydenham to found the basis of an equitable political system; and he aided Metcalfe in strangling popular rights. He was courteous and genial in private life, had strong personal friendships, and was a pious adherent of the Catholic faith. He believed that the king could do no wrong, and that the duty of the subject was to obey the sovereign or the vice-regent, unquestioningly, under every circumstance. He would be an odd figure upon the scene now, and even in his day was a curiosity. He was the amarantus of the cabinet, its never-fading flower; but his enemies used harsher prose, and named him the "Vicar of Bray." His preferment in after days to high place and title, is an eloquent commentary on the wisdom and discrimination of Downing Street.

Another noted man of this Parliament was Robert Baldwin Sullivan. He was born in Ireland, but emigrated to Little York when only a lad, and studied law there in the office of his uncle, Doctor Baldwin. While a student he was appointed legislative librarian, and, we are told, made the most of his opportunity among the political records. He was admitted to the bar about 1825, but not thinking himself qualified for city practice, moved to the county of Middlesex. But his success in two cases, especially in the libel suit of the demagogue Collins, attracted much attention, and he was invited to remove to Toronto. He accepted the invitation, moving thither in 1828. In 1834 he entered public life, opposing William Lyon Mackenzie for the mayoralty of the newly incorporated town of Toronto. Up to this period, his liberalism in politics had not been doubted. But it appears he now became disgusted with Mackenzie and his most zealous supporters, who, whatever their political virtues, were noisy and coarse, and could easily be mistaken for demagogues. From this date an estrangement grew up between him and the reform party, and when Sir Francis Bond Head offered him a seat in the council, he readily threw himself in with the Compact. He was a member of Sir George Arthur's council, and lent his strength to putting the rebellion down; was also in the cabinets of Lord Sydenham, Sir Charles Bagot, and Lord Metcalfe. Strangely enough, under the galling rule of the latter, he returned to his first love, retired from office with his colleagues, and afterwards attacked Metcalfe in a number of slashing letters signed "Legion." In the Baldwin-Lafontaine cabinet, under Lord Elgin, he was provincial secretary for a time, and was elevated to the bench in September, 1848. He died on the 14th April, 1853.

Mr. Sullivan's public career would not be a good model to hold up to the aspiring politician. He was a brilliant and powerful speaker, but he had no convictions, and upon the very subjects, in discussing which, he lashed himself into the whitest heats, he often felt the least. In every man is born a moral instinct which reveals the difference between right and wrong, and points out those principles that are the great highways in the moral field; but not to all men is given that perception in the same degree. In some indeed the duty path is plain as the lines that scar the brow, while to others so vague appears the way that they are ever in doubt, and cross and recross the faint-traced path unconsciously. Mr. Sullivan was one of this latter class. He had warm and generous impulses that came from his soul, but he would tell you after he had made a speech upon some great principle, that thrilled, if not convinced, every one who heard it, that he did not believe a word of what he had said himself, and that with as good or better reason he could have made a superior speech upon the other side. Not unlike Voltaire, when he said to the young infidel, "You say I have made it as clear to you as the sun in heaven, that there is no God?—then it is by no means so clear to myself!" In his day Mr. Sullivan was the meteor of the political sky.

With M. D. B. Viger, at one time a noble patriot, we need not concern ourselves at any length. He was born in Lower Canada, studied law, and at an early age took part in the movement for political freedom. In 1834 he proceeded to England, and laid the grievances of the French people before the government; and in 1837, rose with Papineau into rebellion. He was arrested for treason and thrown into prison; but on being released was returned again to parliament by a sweeping majority. He was also elected to the first parliament under the Union, and took his place prominently among the reformers. Mr. Viger was a mild and venerable man, who no doubt loved his country, but it is hard to resist believing that he was somewhat jealous (as old men nearly always are of young rivals) of the young French leader. He did not forget that this leader, M. Lafontaine, had been once a lad in his office, and from his lips learned his first political lessons. Now the people had forgotten the master and rendered homage only to the student. When the reformers were forced out of the cabinet, Metcalfe, we need not doubt, had his eye upon the venerable patriot, and, master of cunning that he was, poured into the old man's ear a long tale of flattery, telling him that he was the father of the French people, and their rightful leader; and that therefore it was he wished him to take a seat in the council. Whatever the wily governor said or did not say, the old man walked into the trap, and covered his lustrous age with no little ignominy. He lived to a very old age, and was serene to the parting moment. The account of his last hours is touching reading, and we linger by the bedside to see the glared eyes brighten for a moment, while the dying man utters, with his parting breath, "J'aime mon Dieu, et j'aime mon Pays."

Looking through the house among the opposition, we see another figure deserving special notice. This was a man of low stature, with a bright eye and an electric movement. John Sandfield Macdonald was born at St. Raphael, in the County of Glengarry, Upper Canada. His grandfather, a Scottish Highlander and Roman Catholic, had emigrated thither from Scotland in 1786. There was a good deal of romance in the youthful days of this politician. He left the paternal roof at the age of eleven, we are told, resolved to do for himself in the world. Discovered many miles from home, he was taken back against his will, but he soon took an opportunity to start off the second time. On this occasion, as he was bargaining with an Indian at Cornwall to paddle him across the river to the United States, the Indian demanding a half a dollar, and the lad having only a quarter, his father came up and again carried him home. He soon broke away a third time, and hired with a store-keeper for three years at a sliding scale of salary, £10 for the first year, £12 10s. for the second year, and £15 for the third year. He removed after two years to a store in Cornwall, but abandoned the position in a few months, and entered upon a study of law with Dr. Urquhart of the same town. The following occurrence, it is related, turned him from mercantile pursuits to the law: One day, while out in the streets, he was pelted with snow-balls by urchins, who, at the same time, contemptuously called him a "counter hopper." It was not for the snow-balls he cared, but he was stung with the thought that the calling he had adopted could be flung reproachfully in his face.* In June, 1840, he was called to the bar, having completed his studies in the office of Mr. Draper. He was first elected to parliament after the Union, in March, 1841, and joined himself with the opposition, though he had no love for Sir Allan MacNab, the leader of that party. Up to this time Mr. Macdonald had loose notions about political principles--by the way, he always had—but when Metcalfe developed into a political tyrant he joined the ousted ministry; and it was because political treachery was revolting to his mind that we find him now sitting among the opposition benches. Though we shall meet him again, we may as well anticipate some of the events in his career. Although a Roman Catholic, he opposed separate schools; and his clergy denounced him from their altars. But he was very dear to the affections of his brother Highlandmen, whom he could address fluently in Gaelic ; and they voted for him despite the dicta of the priests. At the election of 1844, there were 18,000 inhabitants in his county, Cornwall, and of these nineteen-twentieths were of Scotch descent ; while of Macdonalds alone there were not fewer than three thousand two hundred, all of whom spoke Gaelic. Four years before this date Mr. Macdonald married a lady from Louisiana, the daughter of a United States, senator and owner of a large plantation of negroes. His after career is not uninteresting, and we shall see this nervous man, with the bright eyes, often, before our story closes.

CHAPTER VII.

THE LAST DAYS OF TORYISM.

WHILE the struggle for constitutional government was going on in this country, three great questions profoundly stirred the minds of men in the mother land. One of these began thirteen years before within the hallowed walls of Oxford, when the conviction dawned upon the "sweet and saintly Keble," who has been likened to Goethe's star, a soul "without haste and without rest," that the Church of England had wandered from the apostolic road into the world's by-ways, and that, while the body grew out into fair proportions and decked itself in purple and fine linen, the soul within it languished to the very gasp of death. And Keble, sore in spirit that his beloved church should see such an evil time, told his sorrows, and gathered around him some of the most sincere and lofty spirits in England. Within the college walls, one evening, as the wind murmured through the classic trees, with Richard Hurrell Froude, Dr. Pusey, John Henry Newman and others, he inaugurated the movement that first became manifest by the publication of the series of arguments contained in the "Tracts for the Times." Bold and searching were the arguments in these papers, startling, if not audacious, were their doctrines. As tract after tract appeared, the thinking world became profoundly stirred, and the bishops turned uneasily in their chairs. It would have been easy to hush the voice of the skeptic or the unbeliever within the walls of Oxford, and the church, whether papal or episcopal, has never hesitated to enforce silence by authority, while the nerve remained to her arm; but here the bench of bishops was met by the thrilling appeal of some of the most pure and lofty spirits in the realm, men who neither doubted nor disbelieved, who aimed not to pull down the church, but to build her up, to make her better and not worse, and who had discovered but too many unpleasant truths which they dragged into the light by the aid of a merciless and all-penetrating logic. So they calmly bowed their heads before the storm, though their mighty fabric rocked, and braved the rack till "No. 90" came rolling from the press. This was the most famous of the series, was written by Newman, and was the climax to which the whole current of the argument had hitherto been tending. The bishops at once took the alarm; the vice-chancellor and the heads of houses met; they condemned the tract and censured the writer. The voice you may still by force, but opinion you cannot stifle. Newman had entered upon a vast field of speculation; and those who saw the trend of his thought, must have known that only one church upon earth for him could be a staying-place. He still taught in the college and in the pulpit, and, in the words of Mr. Gladstone, was "all the while, without ostentation or effort, but by simple excellence continually drawing under-graduates more and more around him." He went to the continent, and wandered through classic cities like a man in a dream. In these wanderings the whole world to him seemed dark, and he, himself, as an infant groping his way to find a home. It was then his spirit breathed, and he wrote, that sweetest of our English hymns, that, pealed now upon ten thousand organs through all christendom:

"Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom, Lead Thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home;—
Lead Thou me on."

that he was travelling fast to Rome. His secession staggered the church of which he had been the most brilliant star; and twenty-five years afterwards Mr. Disraeli describes his separation as having "dealt a blow to the church of England, under which she still reels." While we do not believe that the falling away of any one man could, to this extent, injure a church with a throne and government forming two of its constant bulwarks, we may suppose that the secession was a serious loss. But Newman, in a simple surplice, preaching in a modest episcopal chapel, was a far greater menace to the episcopacy, than Newman with a cardinal's hat, or thundering out of the chair of Peter. When he went over to Rome the danger was past, and the wildly agitated heart of the established church attained its normal, sober beat.

While the divines saw with trepidation the movement in the theological world, politicians were filled with interest in the struggles of the giant O'Connell for a repeal of the union. They had heard him say, and they knew the tremendous force he would employ to keep his pledge, "The year 1843 is, and shall be, the repeal year." They saw the whole of Ireland rise as a man at his call and stream from the mountains and out of the cities in thousands, headed by their priests, with the regularity of soldiers, to attend his monster open-air meetings. The fame of the agitator and his movements were known over the world, and distinguished strangers visited Ireland to hear the man in whose word, and voice, and gesture there was some witching power, potent to move to tears or laughter, to pity or indignation, the tens of thousands of his countrymen who gathered in the fields at his call. When Lord Metcalfe began the play the tyrant in Canada, O'Connell was addressing surging crowds among the hills of Kerry, and appealing to "yonder blue mountains where you and I were cradled." The fame of O'Connell and the hopes of his followers were not unknown in Canada; and not a little of the zeal in the cause of Metcalfe and the Crown was kindled on the hustings by the reminder, from some wily tory, that the air was full of the "spirit of this repeal," that they "wanted separation in Ireland, and less would not satisfy them in Canada." But the great fabric that O'Connell raised was destined to pass away as dissolves the picture in a troubled dream. And almost as sudden as the fall of the movement, was the fall of its originator. Now we stand spell-bound in the gallery of the commons listening to "the thunder of his eloquence ;" Charles Dickens, while a reporter in the gallery, is so moved by the pathos of one of his speeches that he has to lay his pencil by; the discerning critic, Lord Jeffrey, regards all others whom he hears as "talking schoolboy" compared with the agitator. Yet a little, yea, in three short years, and we see him making his last speech—this giant who so took the fancy of Lord Lytton among his native mountains, that he made him the subject of a poem—tottering feebly by a table. "His appearance was of great debility, and the tones of his voice were very still. His words, indeed, reached only those who were immediately around him, the ministers sitting on the other side of the green table, and listening with that interest and respectful attention which became the occasion. * * It was a strange and touching spectacle to those who remembered the form of colossal energy, and the clear and thrilling tones that had once startled, disturbed and controlled senates. * * * It was a performance in dumb show ; a feeble old man muttering before a table."* He longed now to get away to Rome, to soothe his spirit in the shadow of her wing and there lie down to rest. He hurried away just as the shadows of famine began to gather over his beloved land, struggled to Genoa, on his way to the holy city, and there died.

The most engrossing movement of the three, perhaps, was that which stirred the whole commercial frame of Great Britain—the question of a tax on corn. This movement had been set on foot and carried out with a force and a success before unequalled, by those unique and singularly honest and able politicians, Richard Cobden and John Bright. These were the two gifted men who could, in the words of Kinglake, "go bravely into the midst of angry opponents, show them their fallacies one by one, destroy their favourite theories before their very faces, and triumphantly argue them down." This description helps us to understand how a government chosen to maintain the duty on corn should suddenly announce its conversion to the doctrines of free trade; and how Sir Robert Peel could stand boldly up in the parliament four years after his election to maintain the duty, and frankly tell the house: "I will not withhold the homage which is due to the progress of reason and truth by denying that my opinion on the subject of protection has undergone a change." The sudden revolution in English opinion on this question created much surprise and some excitement here, but though Peel fell in the moment of victory, and a young rival seized the occasion to raise himself to eminence, no hand has since succeeded in renewing the life of the corn laws. They are dead, and, we doubt not, will sleep now till the sound of the last trumpet.

In the autumn of 1845 a period of chilling winds and wet prevailed in Ireland, and the potato crop, the mainstay of the great majority of the working people, began to rot in the ground. The extent of this calamity will be understood when it is learnt that large numbers of the labouring class received no wages, but tilled the fields of the land-owner on the "cottier-tenant system"; that is, giving their labour for the use of a patch of land in which to plant potatoes. Generations, in many districts in Ireland, had grown up and passed away, and never tasted flesh meat, unless fortune sent a rabbit, perhaps once in the year, through the hedge, when it was stealthily dispatched with a pitchfork, conveyed home under the mother's cloak, and eaten in uneasy silence. So when the long-continued, drizzling days set in, and the potatoes began to rot in the ground, a feeling of horror crept over the country. Not a county escaped the devastating hand, but the southern and western districts fared the worst, and were soon plunged into all the horrors of famine. Hundreds of persons, wandering aimlessly along the roadside, searching in vain for food, fell down and died. To add to the horror of the famine, an epidemic, known as "faminæ fever," set in, and with this a terrible form of dysentery. Between these frightful scourges, and hunger, thousands were carried away; their dead bodies lay in the ditches, and the town authorities refused any longer to burthen the living with expense in providing coffins for the dead. In the early stages of the mortality coroners held inquests, and juries often brought in verdicts of wilful murder against Lord John Russell or the lord lieutenant, either of whom, it was believed, could have furnished relief to the starving population. Crowds of girls and young women, tortured with hunger, came from the mountains and the villages, and entering the city, smashed the windows of shops, and committed every possible act of destruction to property, in the hope of being sent to jail, where they could get food to eat.

The gloom of this reign of horror was somewhat enlivened by the appearance upon the scene of a fashionable French cook, M. Soyer, who appeared in silver buckles and shining velvet, at the head of a soup kitchen in Dublin under the patronage of the lord lieutenant. The object of the cook's appearance seemed to be less to relieve the hunger of the suffering throngs than to demonstrate a nice scientific point over which he had long been brooding; namely, that the extent to which the inhabitants of the earth up to that time had eaten was an excess and a folly, and that a strikingly sustaining potage could be produced out of the thinnest and cheapest articles of food. A character in one of Scott's novels had an old mare upon which he applied the same principle, however, long before the day of the dandy French cook. This individual began by lessening the ration of hay to his poor old beast from day to day, aiming to bring the daily food down to one straw ; and he would have been successful, we may suppose, had not the " puir naig " died the day before he made the final experiment. Frightful though this famine was in all its consequences of death, and riot, and crime, we can scarce help regarding it as Goldsmith looked upon the French revolution—a " blessing in disguise." From a population of eight millions, overcrowded in sties too filthy even for the brutes, the number of Ireland's inhabitants fell to six millions. If that famine did nothing but let in additional air and sunshine upon these remaining six millions it surely cannot be called a scourge. But it did better than this : it taught the peasant that there are other lands besides his own dreary bogs and sterile mountainsides, lands where there is bread to be had for honest toil, and where rack-renting and the miseries of an organized pauperdom is not known. Thereafter, the inhabitants, with a new hope, turned their faces to the setting sun, and there saw the land of their deliverance. They poured into Canada during the dark year following the famine, 70,000 in the one season alone. On the Atlantic voyage, huddled together in worse plight than the cattle we now ship to British markets, in all the filth and misery of a load of negroes under a slaver's hatches, they sickened of fever and dysentery and died like sheep. Through the summer long they poured in upon Grosse Isle, till the fever broke out with redoubled violence among the filthy and pent-up hovels, and the very air that blew about the island was loathsome, and instinct with death. " Army after army of sick and suffering people," McMullen tells us, " fleeing from famine in their native land to be stricken down by death in the Valley of the St. Lawrence, stopped in rapid succession at Grosse Isle, and then, leaving numbers of their dead behind them, pushed upwards towards the lakes in overcrowded steamers to burden the inhabitants of the western towns and villages." The inhabitants, without regard for race, colour, or religion, gave all the assistance in shelter, food and clothing to the sufferers that they could; but there was a bitter feeling abroad as ships carried in cargoes of Lord Palmerston's tenants to add to the others already living upon public charity. The people could have borne the load of sharing their own scanty store with the sufferers, but it aroused their indignation to think that the British Government should utilize Canada merely to get rid of useless and burdensome subjects. No pen can describe the horrors among the miserable and filthy masses that sweltered in their fever and poisonous dirt under the summer sun on Grosse Isle, or the anguish of mothers separated from their babes and children in the wild hurly-burly on board the ships and during debarkation. Scores of children who could not yet lisp their own names were thus thrown upon public charity, and at least one of these, a weakly infant, alone in the fumes of the plague, exposed to die, was taken in by kindly people, and is now a leading member in one of our Provincial Cabinets. Like the child of Zanoni that smiled through all the tumultuous horrors of the French revolution, we see this infant deserted 'mid the pestilence of the river isle, and hear the words, "See! the orphan smiles. The fatherless are the care of God."

When Metcalfe left Canada to die, the old dispute about the Oregon boundary took on an alarming face, and our people expected grievous trouble. As early as 1818, an attempt had been made to harmonise the claims of the British and the United States governments to a portion of the territory lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific coast, but the negotiations failed, and the disputed regions were left to a joint occupation. For many years the debatable land seems to have escaped the attention of both countries, till the fertility of the Pacific slope and the value of some of the ports for naval stations came to be known, when the question suddenly assumed a serious prominence. The joint occupation was continued down to 1843, when the president of the United States peremptorily, if not insolently, called for a prompt settlement of the question. The Monro doctrine must have been strong in the minds of the quarrelsome party in the United States then, and the call of the president in 1843 does not seem unlike a summons to the British nation, to show cause why her subjects should not be swept off the continent, and on what grounds at all they claimed a foothold there. The Canadians had not learned then as well as they know now, that it takes a good deal of American bluster to make one cannon shot, and that a noisy president or a party in war paint does not represent the whole spirit of the republic. But the Canadians became alarmed at the noise, and looked to their muskets. The British government expected to see the glove thrown down every moment, and appointed a military governor, who had instructions to put the frontiers in a state of defence, and make the country ready for war. The governor chosen, Earl Cathcart, a brave soldier who had seen fire in Holland and the Peninsula, and had three horses shot under him at Waterloo, was an admirable selection at such a crisis. But the threatening cloud blew away before it broke; the compromise of Lord Aberdeen, the foreign secretary, was accepted, and the treaty of Oregon made. This provided, among other things, that the dividing line along the disputed territory should be "the forty-ninth degree of latitude from the Rocky Mountains, west to the middle of the channel, separating Vancouver's Island from the mainland; thence southerly through the middle of the channel, and of Fuca's Straits to the Pacific." By this treaty Vancouver's Island remained to Great Britain, as also the free navigation of the Columbia river. On this basis the question rested for a time, to be disturbed again during the framing of the treaty of Washington. Still war's alarms having now subsided, Earl Cathcart was relieved of his civil responsibilities, and a new governor sent out.

The day the evil genius of the tory government left Canada to die, the fate of the Family Compact was sealed. Removed from the subtle charming of the governor's voice, poor old Viger came to see the unlovely place he held, and, smitten with remorse, resigned the presidency of the council, and practically disappeared from the political scene for ever. Mr. W. B. Robinson, who had resigned the inspector-generalship a year before, became commissioner of public works, and Mr. John Hillyard Cameron, one of the most brilliant legal stars in the horizon, then in his thirtieth year, became solicitor-general instead of Mr. Sherwood, who earned removal by having shown contempt for the government, and hostility to Mr. Draper. Nearly every day brought a change, or the rumour of a change in the cabinet, and the government seemed not unlike the dying man, who, racked with pain, now takes one end of his couch and now another in the hope of bettering his condition. Weary of the turmoil of public life, and disgusted with the bitter fruit it brings, Mr. Draper yearned to spend the remainder of his life in the rest and calm of the bench; but whenever he spoke of moving there was a general rising at the cabinet seats, as if not one, but all, would be the premier, and he was obliged to forego retirement till a successor without a rival appeared.

It was during this time that many eyes were turned to the member for Kingston, as a rising hope of the declining party, but he seems not to have been anxious to "go on board a ship that was foundering." Yet the impression went abroad and got into the public prints, that the member for Kingston was about to enter the cabinet. A Toronto paper, violently opposed to the government, but an admirer, evidently, of Mr. Macdonald, heard the rumour, and told its readers rather sadly: "Mr. John A. Macdonald is marked for another victim; he too will speedily be a flightless bird." A Montreal journal, which has not since ceased to support Mr. Macdonald, told its readers something different. "The appointment of Mr. Macdonald," it said, "if confirmed, will, we believe, give universal satisfaction. A liberal, able, and clear-headed man, of sound conservative principles, and unpretending demeanour, he will be an acquisition to any ministry, and bring energy and business habits into a department of which there have been for many years, under the present, and still more under preceding managements, many complaints." But this was a time when government was sustained only for plunder, and some of those who had worn the harness long in the tory cause—who had voted for the good and the bad, and lent themselves to every scheme of their masters—threatened rebellion if any more "recruits" were taken into office. Macdonald took the disappointment with philosophical coolness, told his friends that he did not suppose the world was coming to an end very soon, that he could "afford to wait," and added: "The condition of our party must be worse, before it is better." During the preceding session he had sat, as usual, industriously at his desk; but in one discussion which came up he took a part which is interesting to us now in view of an important act of legislation of his later life.

On the first of May, Mr. Cayley had a resolution before the house seeking to regulate a scale of differential duties on importations in leather manufactures, which was bitterly opposed by some of the reformers. Among those who warmly defended the resolution was Mr. Macdonald, and what he said is interesting, because we have heard that in adopting the "national policy," as in other matters, he was only "the creature of expediency," and did not believe the principle of protection to be good. But it will interest, if it will not discomfit, those who say this, to learn that on the 1st day of May, 1846, Mr. Macdonald stood up in his place in the Canadian parliament and told "hon. gentlemen that there was no reason in their opposition to these resolutions;" that "had they studied the question they must have supported them," that "the measure of the hon. gentleman was really a protective one, and as such deserved unanimous support;" for "it would prevent the trade of Canada from being subject to the competition of American artisans, and not among the least to the artisans of American penitentiaries."

And now drew on the last days of toryism in Canada. Its sun was low in the sky, even when Metcalfe put his dignity by and appealed to party in the name of the Queen. It lay not in the power of man or any combination of men to bring the life back again to its palsied limbs. Toryism is the policy of stagnation, the force that opposes change and progress. It cannot live where the will of the people is supreme. It was put upon its trial in Canada, in the summer of 1848, and fell, never again to raise its head. We know the term "tory" is still applied to one of our great parties, and that we are told "toryism still lives;" but surely our informants are those who are not acquainted with the history of public parties in the past, or who understand the genius of political opinion in the present. But after all, it matters really little what we call our parties now, since there is not necessarily a connection at any time between the name and the nature of any thing. It is not so long ago since a profound and dogmatic thinker would be styled a "duns," because he resembled the over-learned and profound Scotus. Now, that name dunce we apply only to a blockhead—and not more striking has the difference between the Duns of six hundred years ago, and the dunce of now become, than between the tory of 1840, and the tory of 1883.

In the autumn of 1846, Lord Elgin, the greatest of Canadian governors up to his day, Durham excepted, arrived in Canada. He was a member of the tory school, and the reformers became sore afraid when they heard of his coming; yet they had already learnt how really little there is in a governor's party name. When Sir Francis B. Head came they posted proclamations upon the fences, but before the little boys tore down the placards, they began to learn how sorely they had been deceived. When Metcalfe, "the great liberal," came, they had no letter black enough in their type-cases to print their "Welcomes;" a day came upon them when ink was not dark enough to paint his character. But when Bagot, "the tory," came, they hung down their heads in gloom; and were wearing mourning faces when he called their leaders to his cabinet. Lord Elgin was a nobleman in the peerages of Scotland and the United Kingdom, and was a Bruce of the illustrious house which had for a member the victor of Bannockburn. In 1842 he had been appointed governor of Jamaica; and upon the change of government in England in the summer of 1846, and the establishment of peaceable relations between the imperial and United States governments, was sent out to Canada. Shortly before departing for his seat of government he married his second wife, Lady Mary Louisa, the eldest surviving daughter of the late Lord Durham, but left his bride to follow him when the tempestuous season passed. He arrived here in the early winter, and at once threw his whole energies into the work before him. It was plain to those who watched his movements with an intelligent eye that he had studied the political condition of Canada before he passed the Atlantic; nay, more, he alarmed the apostles of the Compact by telling the inhabitants of Montreal: "I shall best maintain the prerogative of the Crown by manifesting a due regard for the wishes and feelings of the people, and by seeking the advice and assistance of those who enjoy their confidence." He had studied carefully the doctrines laid down by his illustrious father-in-law and found they were good. He soon mastered the condition of affairs in Canada, and saw, so his biographer* tells us, that in the ruling party "there was no real political life; only that pale and distorted reflection of it which is apt to exist in a colony before it has learnt to look within itself for the centre of power." He frankly and heartily assisted the effete and unrepresentative body he found in office, but plainly told them that he should as cheerfully and not less heartily assist their opponents. The governor was doubly tied to his duty. Canada had long been looked upon as a stormy sea, studded with breakers, where administrators were as likely to meet with shipwreck as to win laurels; and he was determined to avoid the rocks. Then, as dear to him as his own success was the reputation of his father-in-law, Lord Durham, which still trembled in the balance, and must so remain till the principles he laid down had been worked out for weal or woe. He was here to win a reputation for himself in following out the principles laid down by the father of his absent bride: we may be sure most earnestly did he set himself to his duty. His manly form was seen at several public meetings, exposed to the fierce winds of our Canadian winters, and he had not appeared upon many platforms before it was learnt that he was the most eloquent speaker in Canada.

In the spring following his arrival the dying man of the tory cabinet shifted his place once again. Attorney-general Smith resigned, and Hon. Wm. Badgley took his place. "Your turn has come at last, Macdonald," said Mr. Draper, as he waited on the Kingston member, and told him that the receiver-generalship was at his disposal. Macdonald took the post, and thenceforth the cabinet had the benefit of advice, which, if possessed at an earlier day, might have saved it from a doom that now no human hand could avert. Once again Mr. Draper yearned to be rid of the turmoil of public life, and the companionship of faithless friends, and offered the premiership to John Hillyard Cameron; but staid supporters of the dying ministry said the young lawyer had not yet won his spurs; and Mr. Sherwood, who now appears to have had a small following, threatened to secede. Cameron did not press his claims, if it can be said that he had any claims, and Mr. Sherwood saw the ruling aspiration of his life gratified. In the speech opening the session, the governor announced the relinquishment of post-office control by the imperial parliament, and the repeal of differential duties, in favour of British manufacturers. The old hull of the Compact ship, the vessel in which they had sailed so long, and enjoyed the privilege of office with all its spoils, was exposed to a merciless, we may say a murderous, fire from the opposition guns, and though division after division showed that the government was in a sad minority in the house, ministers said naught about resignation. The sunset of Mr. Draper's political life seemed to have given him mystical lore, and the speech he made reviewing his own career, and setting forth his opinion on the duties of ministries, might have been regarded as a valuable death-bed sermon. Like Saul, the scales seemed to have fallen from his eyes of a sudden, and that which he had never seen before, though he must have heard it times without number, was instantly revealed to his vision. He told, in no boastful spirit, that he had always tried to serve his country to the full extent of his powers, and dwelt with no little feeling—indeed, shed tears as he spoke—on the ingratitude of men at whose hands he had deserved better things than conspiracy and calumny. He gave no uncertain sound when he came to speak of responsible government. That, he said, was the only method by which the country could be governed justly and well.

After the close of the session another shuffle was made of seats in the doomed cabinet, and Mr. John Macdonald, whose administrative ability commanded general attention, was removed from the receiver-generalship to the office of crown lands, then the most important department in the public service, and one that in the past had been most shamefully, if not criminally, mismanaged. Here he established a new and better order of things, reducing confusion and delay to order and promptness, till, during the brief time his place was vouchsafed to him, the report went abroad that if the government were effete and incompetent they had, at least, among them one master business head.

In December a dissolution was granted, and for the last time the cause of toryism appealed for support to the electorate of Canada.

CHAPTER VIII.

RULING IN STORM:

THE reformers entered the contest with cheerful faces, and the tories fought sullenly on the deck of their sinking ship. A change had come over the country since the autumn which saw the governor-general the leading spirit in one side of a party contest. The public is sometimes an impulsive and not too just arbiter between men or questions; but it is possessed of a broad generosity, and is certain to show sympathy eventually, for that one to whom it discovers, on reflection, it has done injustice. And, as Carlyle expresses it, since it is always "revising its opinion," it is certain sooner or later to discover if it has gone wrong. A demagogue may succeed for a time in leading the public into extravagance, or gross error, but sober, second thought, is sure to come and set its judgment right. Percival Stockdale thought the public always wrong, because as often as he gave them his verses, so often did they cast them aside, after a hasty glance; the author going back to the country comforting himself on "the verdict of posterity." But Percival lives now only among "The Curiosities of Literature." Whenever you see a man who has had an opportunity of stating his case, whatever it may be, before the people, and see them withhold their approbation, be assured that the public is not stupid, or unjust, and that the man is another Percival Stockdale.

By foul means, and through false cries, a verdict had been wrenched from the public against Mr. Baldwin. He bore his defeat with that proud patience which the gods love and men admire; and now that he came before the people, the same lofty and upright character that they had always known him, his principles unchanged by time, sincere and true, to ask of them, in their sober, second thought, for a verdict again, nearly all the wholesome sentiment in the country rallied around him. He went to the polls with ringing cries, cries that at the late election were called the voice of treason. Once again he told his hearers, who were now in an impartial mood, that "he was not disloyal, nor were his followers rebels; but this they contended for, nothing more, and nothing less, that what the Queen would not be permitted to do in England, we should not permit the governor to do in Canada. Tories had proclaimed from their hustings that responsible government, as sought by the reformers, would be insufficient, and unworthy of Canada; but he had unbounded faith in its adequacy." And some writer used the apt figure that, as in the unfettered working of the ocean, lay the secret of the purity of its waters, so in the untrammelled operation of colonial government lay the secret of its justice and purity.

In Lower Canada, the people, the great bulk of whom were reformers, were loudly jubilant and lit bonfires before the opening of the polls, in anticipation of a sweeping victory. The question that most agitated public gatherings there was that of recompense to persons who had suffered losses, either by the rebels or the soldiers, during the uprising of 1837. The rebellion of 1837-38 had no sooner been put down than resolutions were introduced into the legislature of Upper Canada providing for the appointment of commissioners to investigate the claims set forth by certain loyal inhabitants for damages sustained during and by "the late unnatural rebellion." The report of these commissioners was made the basis of further legislation during the following session; while the special council of Lower Canada had provided by ordinance a recompense for loyal persons in that province whose property had been injured or destroyed during the collision between Papi-neau's followers and the soldiers. But neither the act of the one legislature, nor the ordinance of the other met the demands of a large number who had suffered by the rising. There came from every quarter, demanding compensation, men whose property had been injured or destroyed, not by the rebels, but by the agents of authority. Nor can we wonder at the nature or the number of supplications, when we take into account the loyalty of the soldiers. Their zeal, we are told in the records of this unfortunate time, did not end when they had left the poor habitant soaking his coarse homespun with his heart's blood on the field where he fell, but they directed their might against property in tainted districts, firing outbuildings and dwellings, slaughtering cattle, and, it is not hard to believe, only ceasing, like Alexanders, in sorrow, because there was naught else to conquer. But in the most disaffected districts, there were some whose adherence to authority had been unflinching, who deplored the uprising, and gave no countenance to the rebels; and these came forward now asking recompense for butchered cattle and demolished dwellings.

Accordingly, shortly after the union, an act was passed extending compensation for losses sustained at the hands of persons acting on behalf of Her Majesty in "the suppression of the said rebellion, and, for the prevention of further disturbances," but the operation of the act curiously enough was confined to Upper Canada alone. Lower Canada, where the conflict had been the greater and the more bloody, where the trained soldiery had been let loose, and scores of the innocent, with the guilty, felt the weight of the arm of authority, was not admitted within the pale of the recompense law. Therefore it was that in 1845 the assembly passed another address praying Sir Charles Metcalfe for a measure which would "insure to the inhabitants of that part of this province, formerly Lower Canada, indemnity for just losses during the rebellion of 1837 and 1838." This change of ministerial attitude is curious reading now, but the wheel had gone round since 1842. Here and there among the remnants of the ancient party was a man who saw the drift of public opinion, and one of these was Mr. Draper. He saw that his party was being every day pushed nearer the brink of the precipice, that French votes and sympathies were on the other side ; and, as drowning men will clutch at straws, seized upon the faint hope of winning Lower Canadian support by authorising commissioners to enquire into the "losses sustained by loyal subjects in Lower Canada during the rebellion, and the losses arising and growing out of the said rebellion." The commissioners were instructed to distinguish between rebels and loyal subjects, but they soon found that every claimant on his own showing, had always been unswervingly obedient to the law. Men who had fired at soldiers out of flint muskets and hacked at the law officers with scythes, came forward claiming compensation for their losses as the reward of their loyalty. The commissioners were non-plussed. They wrote on the 11th of February, 1846, to the governor-in-council, Earl Cathcart, for instructions as to how they might draw a distinction between the loyal and those who had rebelled. The provincial secretary replied that it was not the intention of his excellency that the commissioners should be guided by "any description of evidence, other than that furnished by the evidence of the courts of law." It was pointed out that the commissioners were not to try cases, but merely to obtain a general estimate of the rebellion losses, and that the particulars of the estimate would form the subject of minute enquiry, subsequently, under parliamentary authority. The commissioners presented their report in the same year. This document set forth that commissioners were entirely at the mercy of the claimants where there was no court sentence before them ; and they exhibited a list of 2,176 persons who claimed damages amounting in the aggregate to £241,965. An opinion was expressed that £100,000 would cover all meritorious claims, for it had been ascertained that damages for £25,503 were claimed by persons who had actually been condemned by court-martial for complicity in the rebellion. But the intention of the ministry was not to close the question of these claims, but to temporize and keep it hanging. The report of the commissioners was, therefore, laid by, Mr. Draper, like Micawber, hoping that something would "turn up" by which he might be able to repudiate the claims. Hence it was that another act was immediately passed authorizing the payment of £9,986 to Lower Canada claimants, which sum had been recognised by parliament as due the second session after the union. This £9,986 was not a large amount, Mr. Draper reasoned, but it was a sop to the French party, and a first step, while the larger instalment was impending. But the premier outwitted himself. His instalment was received with anger and contempt, and the gulf between him and the support he sought became wider than ever.

From one end of Lower Canada to the other, during the election of 1848, went up the cry demanding full compensation for rebellion losses. The reform candidates came into the field pledging themselves to satisfy all just claims. Thus it was that Mr. Lafontaine and his party were returned in overwhelming majority.

In Upper Canada the popular tide likewise set with the reformers, though stubborn was the dying fight made by their opponents. In Kingston John A. Macdonald, who was unsparing in his attacks upon the reformers, and not full of eulogy for his own party, whose tactics and ability he must have despised at heart, was returned in triumph. The legislature met on the 25th of February, and the tories proposed Sir Allan MacNab for the speakership. The vote for the speakership is usually a test of the strength of parties, and in this case it revealed that fifty-four of those present were in opposition, and nineteen true to the government. Mr. Morin was then chosen unanimously. Some happy exchanges had been made at the polls. Not among the least of these was the return of Francis Hincks for Oxford, and the rejection of the coarse and noisy Ogle R. Gowan for Leeds. Among the new faces seen in the house were those of George Etienne Cartier and Alexander Tilloch Galt, both destined to play high and honourable parts in the history of their country. For the first time, William Hume Blake, one of the most remarkable men of his day, took his seat in the house. He was born in 1809, at Kiltegan, County of Wicklow, Ireland, where his father was a church of England rector. He received his education at Trinity College, Dublin, and studied surgery under Sir Philip Crampton. Not caring for surgery, he began a course of theology, which seems also to have been unsuited to him, and he subsequently emigrated to Canada, taking up his abode in the backwoods. But wilderness life, separated from all the influences of civilization, was no more fascinating to Mr. Blake and his family than to that class generally, whose hardships Mrs. Moodie has described with such feeling and vividness, and he moved to Toronto, where he entered the legal profession, becoming in a few years one of its brightest ornaments, and eventually adding lustre to the bench of his adopted province.

We shall see that as an orator he had no rival in that parliament, and that his eloquence was not of that icy, passionless kind which comes from the trained intellect—never from the heart—but was instinct with celtic fire, now rising to a storm of withering scorn and invective, now launching forth arrows of piercing sarcasm, and again mellowing down to unsurpassed depths of pathos and tenderness.

On the day following the vote on the speakership, the government resigned, and Lord Elgin called on M. Lafontaine to form a cabinet. After a short delay, the new ministry was announced as follows :—

The shade of Metcalfe could not have been unmoved when the new cabinet ministers came to draw comparisons between Lord Elgin and another governor-general. Now were they met by a gentleman who could no more stoop to an act of meanness in diplomacy than to a similar offence in private life; by one whose attitude towards them was that of a kind friend, if not a father; who knew the weakness inherent in party ministers and the evils by which they are beset. He frankly gave them his confidence and told them he wanted theirs; and that in all things which tended to a just and intelligent administration of affairs they should have the best of his assistance. Though he would scorn to lend his influence to further the interests of any party, even it were the party of his choice, he sat for hours advising ministers to be firm with their measures, telling them of the rocks they had to encounter in their way, and pointing out that they ought to set up high aims and not be turned from these by the pressure of any circumstance. The time was soon to come when both the ministry and the governor would need all the firmness that comes from a conviction of right doing and from philosophy.

On coming into power, the new ministry promptly introduced a series of resolutions into the assembly which was followed by a bill "to provide for the indemnification of parties in Lower Canada, whose property had been destroyed in the y ars 1837 and 1838." The only reservation made in the allowance of claims was in the case of those who had been convicted of rebellion and either imprisoned or transported to Bermuda. Five commissioners were appointed to carry out the Act, and a sum of £100,000 was set apart to satisfy all claims.

The introduction of the measure was the signal for an explosion. Like the bursting of a long pent-up storm, arose a cry of indignation from the tory members and their press. To many it seemed that the day of doom had dawned upon our monarchy. Two poor gentlemen shed tears over their liquor, when mentioning the name of the Queen. The fact is, this bill was only the climax of a long series of outrages. The loyal Family Compact had been driven from power, and superseded by "radicals, rebels and republicans," a trinity of bad blood, but apt alliteration. The head of the government was a Frenchman, a former leader of the society La Jeune France; a man who had been, at one time, an infidel, and at another, a rebel, flying his country from the wrath of the laws. It was no longer deemed dishonourable to have rebelled against the authority of the Queen; nay, more, a bill had been introduced, not only to condone the rebellion, but to indemnify the rebels. For of those who rebelled, it was held that not one in ten had been convicted by the laws; whereas everyone having a stile broken down during the rising, who had not been imprisoned or sent to Bermuda, came forward with claims which the government allowed. But the proudest spirit that chafed under this galling ordinance, was the gallant knight of Hamilton. He must have felt with Solomon, as he glanced back upon all the history which he had made, that the brightest trail a man may leave behind him for the admiration of the world, is but a huge vanity. To what purpose now had he marshalled his "gallant men of Gore," levelling the taverns and dwellings of rebellious owners, or on that dark December night, sent his soldiers to seize the "piratical" Caroline, and give her to the cataract of Niagara. Now that a premium had been put upon rebellion, he saw a sort of derision in the very spurs upon his heels, for they had been given him in token of his loyalty. He resolved, however, that the outrages should not be sanctioned, without a struggle. He rallied his followers in their lodgings; he told them the crisis had come, when rebellion was to be stamped as a crime or a virtue. In his loyal ears, we doubt not, as he trod from alley to alley through the darkness, on his mission of resistance, rang the words of the couplet:

“ Treason does not prosper; what’s the reason?
Why, when it prospers none dare call it treason.”

But he would “dare call it treason,” and, so, girt up his loins for the fight.

His party, therefore, entered the conflict with a will. The knight led the attack, and his invective was unsparing and indiscriminate. He did not wonder that a premium was put upon rebellion, now that rebels were rewarded for their own uprisings; for the government itself was a rebel government, and the party by which it was maintained in power was a phalanx of rebels. His lieutenants were scarce less unsparing and fierce in the attack. But the government boldly took up their position. Mr. Baldwin, attorney-general-west, maintained that it would be disgraceful to enquire whether a man had been a rebel or not after the passage of a general act of indemnity. Mr. Drummond, solicitor-general-east, took ground which placed the matter in the clearest light. The indemnity act had pardoned those concerned in high treason. Technically speaking, then, all who had been attainted stood in the same position as before the rebellion. But the opposition were not in a mood to reason. The two colonels, Prince and Gagy, talked a great deal of fury. The former once again reminded the house that he was “a gentleman”; the latter made it plain that he was a blusterer. Mr. Sherwood was fierce and often trenchant; while Sir Allan reiterated that the whole French-Canadian people were traitors and aliens. At this date we are moved neither to anger nor contempt at reading such utterances as those of the knight's, for it would be wrong to regard them as else than infirmities; and it is regrettable that by such statements the one party should allow itself to be dominated and the other driven to wrath. But through all these volcanic speeches Sir Allan was drifting in the direction of a mighty lash held in a strong arm; and when the blow descends we find little compassion for the wriggings of the tortured knight. It was while Sir Allan had been bestriding the parliament like a Colossus, breathing fire and brimstone against every opponent, and flinging indiscriminately about him such epithets as "traitor" and "rebel," that Mr. Blake, solicitor-general-west, stung beyond endurance, sprang to his feet. "He would remind them that there was not only one kind of rebellion and one description of rebel and traitor. He would tell them there was such a thing as rebellion against the constitution as well as rebellion against the crown. A man could be a traitor to his country's rights as well as a traitor to the power of the crown." He instanced Philip of Spain and James the Secoud when there was a struggle between political freedom and royal tyranny. "These royal tyrants found loyal men to do their bidding, not only in the army but on the bench of justice. There was one such loyal servant, he who shone above all the rest, the execrable Judge Jeffries, who sent, among the many other victims before their Maker, the mild, amiable and great Lord Russell. Another victim of these loyal servants was Algernon Sydney, whose offence was his loyalty to the people's rights and the constitution. He had no sympathy with the spurious loyalty of the hon. gentlemen opposite, which, while it trampled on the people, was the slave of the court—a loyalty which, from the dawn of the history of the world down to the present day, had lashed humanity into rebellion. He would not go to ancient history; but he would tell the hon. gentlemen opposite of one great exhibition of this loyalty; on an occasion when the people of a distant Roman province contemplated the perpetration of the foulest crime that the page of history records—a crime from which Nature in compassion hid her face and strove to draw a veil over; but the heathen Roman lawgiver could not be induced by perjured witnesses to place the great founder of our religion upon the cross. ‘I find no fault in him,’ he said. But these provincials, after endeavouring by every other means to effect their purpose, had recourse to this spurious loyalty—‘If thou lettest this man go, thou art not Cæsar’s friend.’ Mark the loyalty; could they not see every feature of it; could they not trace it in this act; aye, and overcome by that mawkish, spurious loyalty, the heathen Roman governor gave his sanction to a deed whose foul and impure stain eighteen centuries of national humiliation and suffering have been unable to efface. This spurious, slavish loyalty was not British stuff; this spurious, bullying loyalty never grew in his native land. British loyalty wrung on the field of Runnymede, from the tyrant king, the great charter of English liberty. Aye, the barons of England, with arms in their hands, demanded and received the great charter of their rights. British loyalty, during a period of three centuries, wrung from tyrant kings thirty different recognitions of that great charter. Aye, and at the glorious era of the revolution, when the loyal Jeffries was ready, in his extreme loyalty, to hand over England’s freedom and rights to the hands of tyrants, the people of England established the constitution which has maintained England till this day, a great, free and powerful nation.”

Again and again did Sir Allan, tortured by the merciless lash, rise in his place, but still the long pent-up stream of manly wrath and contempt poured forth. “The expression ‘rebel’” continued the speaker, “has been applied by the gallant knight opposite, to some gentlemen on this side of the house, but I can tell gentlemen on the other side that their public conduct has proved that they are the rebels to the constitution and their country.” It required but one taunt more to bring on the climax—and that tau came. “And there sit the loyal men,” continued the avenging member, pointing deliberately at the opposition benches, "there sit the loyal men who shed the blood of the people and trampled on their just rights. There sit the rebels." Choking with rage, Sir Allan arose once again and repudiated the epithet rebel as applied to him, and asked Mr. Blake to retract. This the honourable gentleman firmly refused to do, whereupon a sudden uproar arose through the house, which was followed by a turmoil in the galleries, where spectators had joined in the discussion. Several breaches of the peace were committed, and men grappled and struck at each other amidst the terrified screams of ladies. Many of the disturbers were arrested and the galleries cleared, the ladies seeking refuge in the body of the house. For twenty minutes the chamber was a scene of wild confusion, and remained with closed doors. The sergeant-at-arms was sorely tried to prevent a collision between Mr. Blake and Sir Allan.

As the discussion on the bill drew to a close, Mr. John A. Macdonald, who had all along preserved a stolid silence, rose in his place and told Mr. Speaker that this measure was not going to pass without his protest, and that while his physical strength endured he would offer it resistance. Mr. Macdonald was one of the few members of the opposition against whom the charge of inconsistency for opposing the bill could not be brought, for when Mr. Draper introduced the bill which was the parent of the present measure, Mr. Macdonald had not yet entered the ministry, and was only a passive, if not contemptuous, member of the tory side of the house. Now, however, he became active, and if we can believe the newspaper reports, "fierce." He brought in a petition from his constituents, praying that the moneys of the people of Upper Canada be "withheld from the rebels of Lower Canada." He entreated the government to move slowly and carefully with the bill, and when a minister remarked that they were only waiting for him "to get done speaking to pass it," he launched out fiercely against the promoters of the measure, charging them with utter disregard of the sense of the country, and wanton discourtesy to members of the opposition. He affirmed that the country was aroused against them, and that they were drawing down grave dangers, not alone upon their own heads, but upon the peace of the province. He deprecated the surrender of the interests of Upper Canada into the hands of the members of Lower Canada for party purposes, and hurled no few epithets against Mr. Baldwin. But despite this last effort to kill time, and his reading a long roll of the Mackenzie letters through the tedious night, the bill passed the lower house by a vote of forty-seven to eighteen. The next day, speaking of the debate, the Pilot, the leading ministerial organ, said: "In vain the hopeful ex-commissioner of crown lands, Mr. J. A. Macdonald, ranted about wanton and disgraceful lack of courtesy, and thundered at Mr. Baldwin, the charge of having sold Upper Canada to Lower Canada. It was all to no purpose. Three-fourths of the house were buried in refreshing slumbers. * * * He made a last faint effort to prolong the discussion by reading some thirty papers of Mr. Mackenzie's published letters—and then the whole house was silent."

There only remains the sequel of tory consistency now to be told to complete this chapter of disgrace. The bill had no sooner passed the house than petitions to the governor-general, praying for its disallowance, poured in from every quarter. Lord Elgin received petition after petition in his closet, read each one carefully and thoughtfully pondered the whole question over. He plainly saw that the petitioners, who were tories, were endeavouring to force him into conflict with his ministry and to act over again the part of Lord Metcalfe. And the longer the governor pondered the deeper the impression grew that his duty lay in assenting to the bill. His reasons for this conclusion were abundant and irresistible; and since they were so, he argued that it would be unworthy in him to shift upon the shoulders of the sovereign the onus of assent or disallowance. In the first place dissolution appeared to him unwise and uncalled for, as the ministry had been elected but a few months before on writs issued at the request of their opponents. Then the measure was carried in the popular branch by a vote of more than two to one; and an analysis of this vote showed that of the thirty-one representatives from Upper Canada, seventeen voted for the measure and 14 against it; and of ten members of British origin from Lower Canada six voted for and only four against it. Such logic as this was irresistible, and though the governor saw the dark storm-clouds gathering above his head, he manfully resolved to do the right and give his assent to the bill.

On the afternoon of April 25th, he drove into town at the call of the ministry, to assent to a customs bill, which in consequence of the opening of navigation, it was imperative should go into instant effect. The rumour having gone abroad that assent was to be given to the obnoxious "rebel bill" as it was called, a number of persons opposed to the government, and all of them "gentlemen," packed the galleries of the assembly. They made no stir beyond taking snuff or shaking their cambric pocket-kerchiefs till the governor nodded his assent to the rebellion bill, when they arose as one man, and with much pounding of feet went out of the building. His excellency did not heed the interruption, and when his business was ended, followed by his suite, passed out to his carriage. But he had no sooner made his appearance outside than the body of loyalist gentlemen who had left the building set up a storm of groans, hisses and oaths. Some of them likewise seized bricks, stones or pieces of bottles, while others took addled eggs out of their pockets, and with these missiles an attack was begun on the governor and his party. The vice-regal carriage got away, however, before serious injury was done to anybody. But this was only a small outburst of tory loyalty. Upon the Champ de Mars that evening gathered a large and turbulent crowd. The meeting had been called by placard and Mr. Augustus Heward, nephew of the chief justice of Upper Canada, and a society beau, was in the chair. This gentleman made an inflammatory speech, and was followed by Mr. Ersdale; Mr. Ferres, a newspaper editor; Mr. Mack and Mr. Montgomerie, another journalist, all "gentlemen." The chief subject of the harangue was, "Now is the time for action," while frequently above the din could be heard the cry, "To the parliament buildings." After the chairman had made the closing remarks he shouted out, "Now boys, three cheers for the Queen; then let us take a walk." The cheers were given and the walk was taken. Up to the parliament buildings surged the crowd of gentlemen loading the names of Lord Elgin and the ministry with blasphemous and obscene epithets. The windows were attacked with stones, after which some hundreds of the mob rushed into the building. The assembly was sitting in committee when the visitors burst through the doors. The members fled in dismay, some taking refuge in the lobbies, and others behind the speaker's chair. Then the rioters passed on to their work. Some wrecked furniture, others wrenched the legs off chairs, tables and desks, while some demolished the chandeliers, lamps and globes. One of the party, in the midst of the melée seated himself in the speaker's chair and cried out, "The French parliament is dissolved." He was hurled from his place and the chair thrown over and wrecked. The mace was torn out of the hands of Mr. Chisholm, the sergeant-at-arms, and subsequently left as a trophy of victory in the room of Sir Allan MacNab at the Donegani hotel. In the midst of the riot and destruction there was a cry of "fire." Flames were then found in the balcony; and almost simultaneously the legislative council chamber was ablaze. The party left the building which in a few minutes was doomed. There was little time to save any of the contents, and out of 20,000 volumes not more than 200 were saved. A full length portrait of her majesty, which cost £2,000 was rescued; but on being brought out of the building one of the loyalists punched his stick through the canvas.*

The fire companies promptly turned out on the first alarm, but on their way to the building fell into the hands of the gentlemen engaged in the incendiarism, who detained them till everything had been devoured by the flames.

Through some misunderstanding the military were not on hand, and the mob only left after the most brilliant part of the conflagration was over, flown with victory, and athirst for new conquest. It was a direful night in Montreal. Many a blanched face was seen in the gleam of the conflagration, and a deep shudder ran through the community at the simultaneous clanging of the bells. While the fires of the burning building shone in their windows the ministry held a cabinet and decided to meet the following morning in the Bonsecours Market.

There are occasions when feelings lie too deep for words, and the opening of the next day's session seemed one of these. Mr. Baldwin, who made a motion, spoke in a low voice, as if under the influence of some painful spell; but the worthy Hamilton knight to whom the mob had brought their choicest spoils was in his primest talking condition. It is not worth while to record here what he said, but it is worth stating that Mr. Blake took occasion to make one last comment upon the quality of the loyalty with which the ears of the house had been so long assailed—"a loyalty" he said, "which one day incited a mob to pelt the governor-general, and to destroy the halls of parliament and the public records, and on the next day sought to find excuses for anarchy." It is true indeed that some of the tories had tried to condone the outrages; but Mr. John Wilson, Mr. Badgley and other conservatives denounced the perpetrators with unmeasured indignity.

Mr. John A. Macdonald was one of those who deplored the occurrences, but he censured the Government for lack of precaution when they must have known that the outrages were contemplated; and he attributed all the disgraceful proceedings to the bill they had forced upon the people. In the midst of the general debate he rose and moved that Kingston be adopted henceforth as the seat of government, but his motion was lost by a vote of fifty-one against ten. And others as well as Mr. Macdonald censured the government for not having adopted measures of protection against the lawlessness of the rioters. Ministers, in a timid sort of a way, explained the absence of the soldiers, but read now, and in the light of the mob's after deeds, their explanations do not seem satisfactory. It is much to be able to say as we look back upon this turbulent time, that there was no shedding of blood, but we have no reason to congratulate anybody that for nights the mob held possession of a great city without being confronted by an available military, whether bloodshed would or would not have been the result of the collision. When the mob will rise, take the bit in their teeth and trample upon the supreme law of peace and order they challenge the worst consequences, and have no right to complain of whatever may follow. Forbearance is a virtue we know, but past a certain limit it becomes poltroonery. A coward indeed Lord Elgin was called for submitting twice to the indignities of the rioters without employing the military, but taking all the circumstances into account, whatever grounds there might have been for such a charge against the government there was none whatever for the charge against the governor. His forbearance was dictated by the highest and most worthy of motives.

During the day detachments of the mob appeared where the house was in session uttering hoots and groans, and assaulting any member of the government party who exposed himself. But when night fell over the city the stragglers came together and began again the work of destruction. The houses of Mr. Hincks and of Mr. Holmes, and the lodgings of Dr. Price and Mr. Baldwin were attacked and the windows demolished with stones. Then the mob turned to the beautiful residence of M. Lafontaine, but recently purchased, hacking down fruit trees and burning the outbuildings; then entered the house itself and demolished the furniture and library. Just as the torch was being applied to finish the work the cold but tardy steel of the soldiers was seen glittering in the moonlight and the mob fell back with disappointed howls. Then the loyalists headed off for Dr. Nelson's but were met there again by the bayonets and shrunk back. This too was another night of terror in Montreal, for small detachments of the mob prowled the city through the darkness wreaking their vengeance upon the windows of houses belonging to known supporters of the government.

In the morning placards addressed to "the friends of peace" were posted around the city calling a meeting at the Champ de Mars. The chief speakers at this meeting were Hon. George Moffatt and Colonel Gagy. They counselled order and passed an address to the Queen to call Lord Elgin home.

On the Saturday following, an address was passed by the house bearing testimony to the justice and impartiality which had characterized his excellency's administration, and expressing deep sorrow and indignation at the recent outrages. On Monday, his lordship, accompanied by his suite, and escorted by a troop of volunteers, drove in from Monklands to receive this address. But they had no sooner entered the city than they were assailed with insults and pelted with brickbats and rotten eggs. A stone weighing two pounds crashed through the coach, while a continuous fusilade of eggs and blasphemy was kept up. The address was to be read in "government house," a building so called on Notre Dame Street; and on arriving here the governor found his carriage surrounded by a violent mob. A magistrate read the riot act and the soldiers charged, but the mob gave way, cheering for the troops. They were anxious that their loyalty should not be misunderstood; on the address being read and replied to, the governor set out on his return to Monklands, going by Sherbrooke Street instead of Notre Dame, by which he had come. The mob were outwitted, and set up a howl of baffled rage. They immediately rallied, however, and, seizing cabs, caleches, and "everything that would run," started off in pursuit. At Molson's Corner they overtook the vice regal party, and at once began the attack. The back of the coach was driven in with stones, Col. Bruce, the governor's brother, was wounded in the back of the head, and Col. Ermatinger and Capt. Jones received bodily injuries. The governor himself escaped unhurt. The party eventually distanced the mob and entered the sheltering gates of Monklands.

Meanwhile the spirit of riot had elsewhere risen its head. In several Upper Canada towns where the ultra loyalists were found in strongest force, hooting mobs paraded and smashed the heads and windows of obnoxious persons. In Toronto a number of gentlemen gathered and lit bonfires with all the zeal of religious executioners at Smithfield, and there burnt in effigy Messrs. Baldwin, Blake, and Mackenzie. The lodgings of the latter, who had just returned from exile, were attacked and battered, after which the rioters wreaked their vengeance upon the windows of warehouses occupied by Dr. Rolph and George Brown. But this, after all, was only the bad blood of the community. From all parts of Canada addresses poured in upon the governor, commending the fearless attitude he had taken in defence of popular rights. Of all who prized political freedom the governor was now the darling.

But while the masses rejoiced in the better constitutional era which Lord Elgin had inaugurated, a British American league, representing the tory discontent of the time, was formed at Montreal, with branches in Kingston, Toronto and elsewhere. There were many planks in the platform of the new association, one of which was a scheme for the union of the British North American provinces. Mr. Alexander Mackenzie, in his "Life of Hon. George Brown," thus drily refers to the organization: "Like King David's famous army at the Cave of Adullam, every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves to the meeting of the league. * * They were dubbed Children of the Sun. * * They advocated extreme toryism, extreme disloyalty, and finally threatened to drive the French into the sea. Towards the end of July, a convention from the league sat at Kingston for several days, and one of the speakers there was Mr. John A. Macdonald. Confusion and discord reigned through the gathering. Ogle R. Gowan felt seriously disposed to have Lord Elgin impeached before the house of lords; some other speaker proposed that the league declare for annexation; another said independence would be better, and each had an instant following. Among the many disgusted at the riot of proposals was Mr. John A. Macdonald, who, at an early date, separated himself from the ~~babel.~~ Other leading members followed suit, and the mammoth Family gathering fell to pieces. A few of the fragments reorganized themselves into associations whose objects were annexation and independence.

The news of the outrages created a sensation in England. Mr. Disraeli declared the time to be "a moment of the deepest public interest." Mr. Gladstone, who like the white knight at the cross roads had looked at only one side of the shield, and said it was silver as he set his lance in the rest, declared that Lord Elgin should have disallowed the bill; but Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel and others defended the action of his excellency, and paid warm tribute to the unflinching manliness and broad statesmanship he had shown. In view however of all that had happened, and while the approbation of the British parliament was ringing in his ears, Lord Elgin felt it his duty to signify that his office was at the disposal of the colonial secretary; but that official refused to accept the resignation, and took occasion in warm and generous terms to endorse the course of his excellency.

The 30th of May was the day fixed for the prorogation of parliament, but Lord Elgin did not deem it well to expose himself for the third time to the passions of the mob without taking means of ample defence; so the commander of the forces, Major-General Rowan came down, and the thunder of cannon announced the close of the last parliament ever to sit in Montreal.

The summer sped away and autumn came, but tumult still lived in Montreal. In August the ringleaders in the spring riots were rearrested and released again on bail, but the mob flew to arms, and after nightfall gathered like fiends around M. Lafontaine's dwelling. The inmates knew the fate in store for them should they fall into the hands of that mob, and after due warning fired, wounding several of the rioters. One of the gang, William Mason, was shot in the thigh, and as he fell his associates cried out, "The blood of a Saxon has been shed by a Frenchman." Then, and, as it would seem, when the house and its inmates were about being torn to pieces, the military came and the mob went off, bearing with them the insensible Mason who died next morning.

Since the burning of the parliament buildings, the question of removing the seat of government from Montreal to some other city had been under the governor's consideration. The protracted and outrageous disposition of the mob, which appeared ready to rise to deeds of destruction at any moment out of cold blood, now decided his course. It was therefore fixed that the remaining two sessions of parliament should be held in Toronto, and that henceforth the sittings should be held at that city and Quebec, at each for four years alternately. Thus was the parliament driven out of Montreal, and thus was the reputation of the city once again, as but too often since, smirched by the lawlessness of her mobs.

CHAPTER IX.

THE GREAT MINISTRY FALLS.

AFTER the wild paroxysm of loyalty had spent itself in storm, many of the tories, who by their speeches had stirred their followers up to the riot point, and afterwards attempted to find excuse for their excesses, began to feel ashamed of the part they had played and to be anxious about the consequences. A conclave was held at which it was decided to send Sir Allan MacNab and Mr. Cayley to England to avouch in Downing Street the loyalty of the party who had burnt down the parliament buildings, poked sticks through a picture of the queen, and attacked the representative of the sovereign with addled eggs. No one to this day knows what reception these two got at Downing Street; but as they have remained so reserved upon the subject, it would not be hazardous to say that their silence was probably judicious. Hot upon their heels followed Mr. Francis Hincks, accredited by his government to make known fully the causes of the disgraceful outbreaks. We are not surprised that the colonial office about this time took a good deal of our provincial business into its own hands; for if two parties here had a dispute about a jack-knife they ran to Downing Street to have it settled. Why was it necessary for Sir Allan and Mr. Cayley to hurry off to England to apologize to an indifferent official in the colonial office for the riots in Canada?—and why was it necessary for Mr. Francis Hincks to follow them there? We complained then, and murmur still about Downing Street interference; yet it is we who have taught the officials there how to interfere. Even at this day, though we regard the authority of the colonial office only a fiction, and lash ourselves into a rage when it becomes a reality, we take sometimes the most trivial cases from our own supreme court and refer them to the judicial committee of the imperial privy council. The persons who proclaim the loudest that Canadians ought to be supreme in their own affairs, are among the very first, when a decision contrary to their views is given in our highest courts, to hasten away to the oracle at Downing Street. If every disputed case, originating in a magistrate's court about the paying of a municipal tax or the right of prosecution under a Dominion act, is to be submitted for a decision to the superior wisdom and higher justice of a conclave of English law officers, why perpetuate the costly mockery here of a "supreme" court?

Mr. Hincks returned from England, elated as a schoolboy who had received the "well done" of his parents. During the autumn the weather-cock in the colonial office described a revolution, and the governor-general was raised to the peerage of the United Kingdom for pursuing a course the precise opposite to that for which, five years before, Lord Metcalfe had been ennobled. Though perhaps title conferred according to this method of discrimination, does not fill our minds with awe for the "belted knight, the duke and earl and a' that," that a king can make, the honour was highly prized at the time by Lord Elgin, and properly prized, for his conduct had been on trial before the home government. He made an extended tour of the province, and at every place was received with evidence of admiration and gratitude. As he drove through Toronto a party of gentlemen hurled a few eggs and some bottles at him, but they fell short of the mark. In Kingston a few persons came down to the wharf at which lay the vice-regal steamer, and gave some dismal howls, then slunk away again. This trifling exhibition of tory manners was dictated by fear, however, rather than by hate, for the rumour had got abroad in Montreal that the seat of government was to be removed; whereupon the instigators of the riots in that city promptly sent out emissaries whose duty it was to see that the governor-general was insulted in any city that was likely to be chosen as the capital.

In November the seat of government was changed to Toronto, and the offices established in the dreary pile along Front Street, which does duty to the present day. The government met in all its strength, and he were a rash prophet who would predict that it was not impregnable for many years to come. But some shrewd eyes looking through the assemblage of reformers, saw in this semblance of strength irresistible evidence of weakness. A large majority is to be coveted when parties are divided by some well marked line, and each avows a set of well understood opinions; but the government whose party doctrines are yet only in the formative process, is not to be envied of the possession. One day a vote was taken in the lower chamber which divided the house upon party issues; and as the reformers stood up in all their appalling strength, John A. Macdonald is credited with having observed to a member who sat beside him, "That mighty fabric is soon to go to pieces." His companion replied, "I suppose no government has a perennial lease, but if numbers and apparent harmony count for aught, I think their prospects are good." "Ah, yes," said Macdonald, "apparent harmony! But we shall see."

As has been stated already, the reform party comprised not only moderate seekers for reform, but many who desired radical changes, and not a few who thought we ought to fashion our political system after the republican model. The advocates of these innovations pressed their views upon the government, but neither Mr. Baldwin nor Mr. Lafontaine seemed disposed to move any further at once in the direction of reform, and intimated that the change desired must come through gradual stages. When the attitude of the leaders became known, a number of the most prominent of the government followers met, laid down a new political platform, and resolved to withdraw themselves from the reform party. The chief names in the new combination were David Christie, Dr. John Rolph, James Leslie, and Malcolm Cameron ; and among the concessions they demanded were, abolition of judges' pensions, biennial parliaments, universal suffrage, and election of all public officers. The name given to the new party was the "Clear Grits," a term which first appeared in the Globe. The appellation appears to have originated during a conversation between George Brown and Christie, the latter remarking that they wanted in the new movement "men who were clear grit." The clear grits had no sooner completed their organization in Upper Canada, than Louis Papineau aroused himself and formed in Lower Canada "Le Parti Rouge," a combination less radical than revolutionary. We can fancy that member to whom John Macdonald had made the prediction turning aghast as he saw the great fabric which he had regarded as indestructible already split into three parts. And we might fancy the astute observer telling him to wonder not, that the "greatest was behind."

This double defection set the government reeling ; but many of those who stood fast in their allegiance waited upon ministers and informed them that the time had now arrived when they expected a settlement of the long-burning question of the clergy reserves upon a new basis. Mr. Baldwin professed himself hostile to a union of Church and State, but gave little assurance of meeting the wishes of his supporters ; while Mr. Lafontaine did not conceal his hostility to what he called a "disturbance of vested rights." "When sorrows come they come not single spies but in battalions" that luckless government might have exclaimed. From every quarter evil seemed to come upon them now ; every breeze that blew brought them dark tidings. One of the staunchest ministerial organs hitherto had been the Toronto Globe, but it now assumed such an attitude that ministers felt themselves obliged to repudiate responsibility for its course. In short, the Globe was endeavouring to wipe popery off the face of the earth.

In the year 1850, as many a nervous Englishman had cause to remember, the conviction entered the breast of the Holy Father that the Episcopal Communion of England were preparing to follow Newman over to Rome. So he set about to parcel off the land of protestant Englishmen into ecclesiastical districts, and created Cardinal Wiseman Archbishop of Westminster. The ordinances declaring the districts were written in Rome after the manner of the time when a sovereign pontiff set an English king scourging himself before the tomb of a "rebellious priest," shut up the churches and absolved subjects of their allegiance. "Datum apud Romæ sub anulo piscatoris," wrote the rash papa in the palace of the Peters;" "Given at Rome under the fisherman's ring!" echoed the people of England, some in scorn and many in dismay. They had less experience of "paper towns" in England than has fallen to our share in Canada since the inauguration of the "boom," or they might have regarded the employment of the pope in setting districts off on sheets of vellum, as of no very serious consequence. Yet, alarmed thousands of very valiant Englishmen became, and we have it on excellent authority that the "British Lion" stalked through the land. Lord Truro called forth applause that nigh shook down the building when he quoted, at the Lord Mayor's dinner, the words from the play, "Under my feet I'll stamp thy cardinal's hat in spite of pope or dignities of church;" and thunders of applause were evoked by Kean the tragedian, when in the theatre, he quoted the words from King John, "No Italian priest shall tithe or toll in our dominion." In good season, however, the tumult died, and when the hurly-burly was done, it was found that the "country of protestant Englishmen" had sustained no serious damage.

After Englishmen had become heartily ashamed of their exhibition of fear, the cardinal, the pope and the unfortunate papacy fell into the hands of a wild protestant Canadian. This person was consumed with the idea that the papacy ought to be rooted out of this country, and without calculating whether the object was a possible one, began the crusade in the columns of his newspaper, the Globe. He published the pronunciamento of Wiseman, replying in his editorial columns in language as rough and intemperate as it was intolerant and illogical. Cardinals may be right or they may be wrong, but it is not in writers of George Brown's stamp that they find confuters. Having begun the discussion, Mr. Brown used every means to lash public feeling into tumult. He pictured the Roman hierarchy in Canada as an odious system that menaced the well-being of our social and political institutions, and the public were informed that it was their duty to resist the common enemy. This indiscreet onslaught upon an unoffending portion of the community was made with as much noise and fervour as "temperance reformers" to-day employ against the vice of drunkenness. But this was the manner of Mr. Brown. He never moved without noise; and whether it was his entry into the legislature, or that he addressed a meeting in a school-house; introduced a bill, or presented a medal to a school girl, the fact was announced by a clatter of kettle-drums and a bray of bugles. It has always seemed to us that the prominence he so suddenly attained, from being a mere adventuring raw youth, to the adviser and hustler of the reform party, was more than Mr. Brown could stand. He was ambitious, and had a great deal of honest, worthy ambition too, we may be sure, but under his brusqueness, which was the result of a lack of refined atmosphere during the formative period of his character and manners, he was inordinately vain of his powers and his position. Early in the year 1851 some newspaper writer declared he was seeking the wardenship of the Kingston penitentiary; but he announced, not bluntly but vainly, in his own paper that he was "seeking higher game than that." Yet he had not the foresight to see that his senseless and uncharitable crusade against a law-abiding and inoffensive Christian denomination must prove a barrier between him and the "higher game" he sought. And he did not injure his own prospects alone, but drove the already shattered government to the alternative of bearing the responsibility of the Globe's fatally reckless course, or repudiating it, and thus alienating its support and following.

Every age and country has produced its partisans, and we see in a book lying before us now, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, with brush in hand, brightening the dark spots in this portion of George Brown's career. Mr. Mackenzie, who, we fear, has not over well informed himself about a period of which he writes, admits that harsh things were said in this discussion by Mr. Brown, but adds that "no article ever appeared (in the Globe) which bore the character of intolerance." "Unscrupulous politicians," he says, "of little or no standing as public men, for years filled their scrap-books with garbled extracts, torn from their context, and used them as electioneering weapons." Through all this whitewash the merciless types in the Globe itself will tell the facts. We have made a few "extracts," not "garbled," and not all "torn from their context," and the whitewash cannot hide their intolerance. Is it tolerance, whether it be the truth or not, which is not the question we are discussing, to be told that "the advance of education has been the death-knell of popery throughout the world;" that "its mummeries have failed to stand the test of free institutions;" that "civil despotism and the papal delusion hang together?"—or will it make the statements less offensive to Roman Catholics to join them with the context? Will the printing of the context make it less offensive to say that "popery binds all men in the most debasing thralldom;" that "this religion robs man of his noblest privilege, direct communion with God. . . . and debases him to the very level of paganism"? Or to ask with a note of admiration, "What a frightful weapon of tyranny the confessional is!" Perhaps we have misunderstood what Mr. Brown's biographer means by intolerance. George Brown was never the imperial dictator of Canada, holding the life and liberty of the subject in his hand. It may be going too far, then, to say he was not intolerant, because he did not banish the Roman Catholics out of the country. But the spirit was willing if the flesh was weak.

A powerful auxiliary of Mr. Brown was Padre Gavazzi, who had broken out of his Roman cage, and was now abroad through Christendom breathing fire and smoke against the papacy. His mission, he said—as reported in the newspapers—was “not to protest against Rome;—it is to destroy, to destroy. It is not protestantism at all, my dear brethren,” said the inflamed padre, “it is destruction; the destruction of pope and popery. My mission is to destroy, to annihilate in my Italy the pope and popery. I am no protestant. Call me destructor, for that is my name.” It is hardly too venturesome to say, that, had Mr. Brown not been “settled down” at this time to politics, the laudable purpose of the Italian priest might have lured him away into missionary work. Mr. Brown was a warm admirer of Gavazzi, for the Globe of June 16th, 1853, described him as “the distinguished defender of the Protestant faith.” It is seldom two such distinguished defenders of any faith get together and some harm does not come of it. It is hardly necessary to add that the papacy withstood the shock of the cleric and the journalist. Indeed, both the editor and the ex-priest are dead, and Rome still lives, or did, at least, “up to the hour of going to press.” It takes more than a great newspaper and a small padre to destroy an institution that may flourish when the traveller from New Zealand stands upon the ruined arch of London Bridge.

The session of 1850 produced a number of important measures, and the most prominent of these referred to an extension of the canal system, which gave to inland shipping an uninterrupted course of navigation from lakes Erie and Ontario by the St. Lawrence to the ocean; the control of post offices and postal revenues by the Canadian government; and a measure for the establishment of free trade between the provinces of British North America.

Notwithstanding the plenitude of important legislation achieved by the government and the latter's apparent impregnableness, it was a house divided against itself, as we have already seen, and soon must fall. Opinion was in a nebulous state among reformers, and just as in the formation of our stellar systems—as some scientists believe—masses of insubordinate matter become detached from the main bulk and roll away, each forming a sphere in itself; so the great reform body was dissevered, one portion becoming rouge, another clear grit, still another independent, the balance remaining true to its original conditions. One might suppose that a party made up of so many independent sovereignties as this would be a helpless mass before the skilful attack of the enemy; but the conservative party, which was then in its chrysalis state—between a dead and effete toryism, and the coming conservatism—was led by the indiscreet and offensive Sir Allan MacNab, who did not injure his opponents by his bad temper and worse tactics and only disgusted his friends. So coarse and so insolent were his attacks on Mr. Lafontaine, and even on Lord Elgin, that Colonel Gogy, who had been an uncompromising tory, arose in his place and disclaimed approval of his leader's course. He said he had borne the reproach of such leadership too long, and announced his separation from the party.

Several consultations were held among the conservatives, and when the government first began to show evidences of division within its ranks, Mr. Macdonald proposed a course of action, but Sir Allan broke so repeatedly beyond the lines which had been laid down, that Macdonald despaired of success by attack. He summoned philosophy however; and at a caucus in Toronto, held by his party to adopt "ways and means," after it was decided that no ways or means could be adopted he remarked, "We need not despair; their sands of life are rapidly running themselves out; they will die in due time if we but let them alone." As early as this date there were several conservatives of the liberal school who whispered among themselves that so long as Sir Allan was the leader there was little hope for a vigorous conservative party. "MacNab and Sherwood were a pair of weights upon Macdonald's wings" a conservative of that day tells us, "and some of our party, I for one, felt that there was no hope till we got a change of idea at the head of our party." It is true MacNab had begun to trim his sails to the popular breeze, so far as he could see the direction in which blew that wind, but he belonged to a past century, and was too old and too stubborn to bend to the demands of the time.

During the spring of the following year, a vacancy occurred in the representation of Haldimand, and a number of candidates, among whom were George Brown and William Lyon Mackenzie, offered themselves for the seat. We have already introduced Brown, but have made only slight mention of Mackenzie. William Lyon Mackenzie, whose figure seen down the galleries of the past, seems in these latter years to the careless student of Canadian history to be suffused with glory, was born at Dundee, Scotland, about the year 1795. In 1824 he established a newspaper at Queenston, Upper Canada, and at once began a galling attack upon the Family Compact. Though he was possessed of a sturdy, independent spirit, and might under any circumstances have brought himself into collision with the powers of the time, in declaring war against the Compact, he had everything to gain and nothing to lose. After a short journalistic career in Queenston, during which his decisive and uncompromising way of dealing with offences against freedom and public morality brought him to some notice, he removed to York and began to issue flaming denunciations in the very shadow of the enemy's camp. The oligarchs became enraged at his attacks, and bitterly complained before some of the young gentlemen of their own set, like Henry when provoked by Becket, that they had no one to rid them of "this fellow's annoyance." The genteel young men consulted about the matter, and one June day in 1826, with canes and kid gloves called at Mackenzie's office; broke open the doors, battered the face off some of the types, and bore away a quantity which they threw in the bay. The persecution only made a martyr of the bitter journalist, who thereafter became a sorer thorn than ever in the side of the Family. Two years later the county of York sent him to the assembly, but here he violated privilege by publishing lengthy reports of the legislative debates; and was expelled. But after the expulsion he was again elected, and again expelled; and the farce was continued till he had been four times elected and as often expelled. In 1834 he was chosen for the second riding of York, and took his seat without molestation. Two years subsequently, parliament was dissolved, and Sir Francis Bond Head and his council adopted corrupt and unmanly ways to keep their opponents out of the assembly. One of the victims was Mackenzie; and exasperated beyond all endurance, he turned his thoughts to rebellion. The story of the farce on Gallows Hill has already been told and need not be repeated. Mackenzie fled away through the wintry woods and found an asylum in the republic for a time, but was afterwards arrested there and thrown into prison. When a pardon was granted to the rebels he made his way back to Canada, and living in the remembrance of the people as a brave man, who with all his indiscretion and impatience, had risked the all he had for popular liberty, he was welcomed to the hustings of Haldimand with vociferous cheers from a thousand lusty throats. But although he seemed to be remembered gratefully by some of the people, he was received coldly enough by Mr. Baldwin and other members of government. The following extract from an unpublished letter, written by him in 1850, to Mr. Aug. Thibodo, of Kingston, will explain his relations to the government, and show also, we believe, why he put himself at the head of a refractory party, after his entry into the legislature. "Mr. Baldwin and his friends steadily strive to keep me down here in means and influence. I applied for three years assembly wages due—refused. Applied for a year's wages due on the Welland Canal—refused. Also for the money due Randal's estate, £500—refused. In every possible way they have striven to render my residence here burthensome to me. Why is this? Are the reformers of '37 the tories of '50? Or does office and the fear of losing it convert manly oppositionists into timid and crouching placemen? If so I trust I'll never be 'led into temptation.'" The anti-papacy articles of Brown rose before their author in the Haldimand election like the ghost of Banquo, and Mackenzie was elected by a fair majority. Brown went back to his newspaper to print more indiscreet articles, and Mackenzie went to the legislature where, for the remainder of his public career, he was at best a hasty critic with a narrow view and limited conception of public measures. Another new face was seen at this last session of the third parliament under the union, a man who, could he have cast the horoscope, would have seen, down the years, political degradation—let us not say dishonour—whether his star showed he deserved that fate or not. Perhaps it is needless to say that the new member introduced to the house was M. Luc Letellier de St. Just.

Parliament met in Toronto in the early spring. The chief measure of legislation was a bill making provision for the construction of railways to supplement the canal system, and put Canada in a position to compete with the carriers of the United States, where railroad building had recently become a mania. A measure introduced during the session by Mr. Hincks authorized the governor-in-council to take steps in concert with the governments of the maritime provinces towards the construction of a railway from Hamilton to Quebec, to make connection there with another line to run along the St. Lawrence and through New Brunswick to Nova Scotia, terminating at Halifax. A meeting of delegates was held in Toronto, and measures were adopted towards the construction of the lines. But when the delegates, Mr. Hincks from Canada and Mr. Chandler from New Brunswick, went to England to ask imperial aid, they were astonished to find that Joseph Howe had either been guilty of duplicity in leading them to hope that help would be given, or that Earl Grey had deceived Mr. Howe; for Sir John Pakington informed them that imperial assistance could not be promised. But out of these projects eventually grew the Intercolonial and Grand Trunk railways. Another important measure of the session was the abolition of the law of primogeniture, in defence of which Mr. Macdonald had aired his early eloquence; but he had grown wiser now, and sat with supreme unconcern while the politicians swept the ideal law of his youth off the statute books.

Macdonald's attitude during the session was not more demonstrative, and less scornful, than it was on his first appearance in the house. On July 19th he brought in a bill relating to the medical profession in Upper Canada, introducing it to the House in a few terse sentences. The measure met with some opposition, and the chief hostility, though for what reason it is hard to tell, came from the Solicitor-General, John Sandfield Macdonald. The arguments used by this opponent were very paltry, and as some other members took up the same strain, John A. Macdonald at last became annoyed. "Mr. Speaker," he said, "if the Solicitor-General is to be logical and consistent, after he has opposed my bill, in view of what it aims to do—and its scope and aims are not denied—he ought to introduce a bill to legalize murder." How apt, not to say how crushing, was this thrust must be apparent to those who will now try to conceive of our great body of medical practitioners without obligations, organization, or protection.

When the simple brother in one of Matthew Arnold's poems plucked the tiny plant to fling at Balder, the gods laughed at his humour, but presently they saw the Father against whom they had hurled their javelins in vain fall, pierced by the fragile weed. The country had seen Mr. Baldwin stand bravely through the clangor of the fire bells, and in the glare of the burning halls of parliament; saw him supreme when Sir Allan MacNab tried once again to coax abroad the spurious British Lion; now they see him, on a measure brought in by William Lyon Mackenzie to abolish the court of Chancery, stand up and declare that he will resign his place in the government. The weed had slain Balder. The house rejected Mackenzie's measure, but a majority of the Upper Canada members voted for it; and though Mr. Baldwin was no advocate for "double majorities" he was cut beyond endurance at this rebuke to his ideal court. His lofty spirit could not bend. It was a time of wonders; for almost immediately afterwards M. Lafontaine arose at his desk and announced his intention of retiring at an early day. "The two masts are overboard," Macdonald remarked in an undertone to Mr. Sherwood; "a helpless hulk there is left now!"

In October, M. Lafontaine withdrew and the other ministers followed him. Lord Elgin, who was now at his lovely residence, Spencer Wood, upon the cliffs of Sillery, sent for Mr. Hincks to form a government. Perhaps Mr. Hincks could not see through the blank wall of the future; perhaps he did get a glimpse through it, but made up his mind to follow the path he had traced out. At any rate he did not send for George Brown, who was burning to get into office, but made up his government as follows:

FROM CANADA WEST.

- HON. FRANCIS HINCKS..... Premier and Insp'r-General.
 " W. B. RICHARDS Attorney-General West.
 " JAMES MORRIS Postmaster-General.

HON. A. N. MORIN	Provincial Secretary.

“ R. E. CARON	Speaker of Legislative Council.

But there was more than one jealous member when Mr. Hincks made out his programme. Mr. John Sandfield Macdonald, who aimed to be attorney general, was offered the commissioner-ship of crown lands, but refused, and went away muttering “curses not loud but deep.” Mr. Brown, as was rather his wont, found vent for his vexation and disappointment in noise, and fulminated more indiscreetly than ever through the Globe. He had little denunciation for the tories—indeed, the tone of his paper was complimentary to John A. Macdonald and many other candidates of the party,—but he was unsparing of the Government, he who had lashed the clear grits such a brief time before for their treachery in putting themselves in opposition to the “redeemers of the country.” But this all happened before he got into the legislature, and, more than all, before he was ignored in the making up of Hincks’ cabinet.

Once again Canada was in the throes of a general election.

CHAPTER X.

“BURNING” QUESTIONS.

THE new government was pledged to the public to provide measures for an elective legislative council, for increased parliamentary representation, the abolition of seigniorial tenure, and the secularization of the clergy reserves. Of all the questions which had agitated the public mind, this latter was the most prominent, the most galling and unjust. Among the other evils planted in the constitutional act of 1791, were the provisions for granting a seventh of the crown lands in the provinces of Canada, for the support of “the Protestant clergy,” and the establishment of rectories in every township or parish, “according to the establishment of the Church of England.” In the early history of Upper Canada, the effect of these grants was not felt, but as the population began to spread over the public domain, and it was found that the sanctified hand of the church had aggregated her reserves in large blocks, to aid in the spread of the gospel according to her way of teaching, a general cry of dissatisfaction was raised. Well might the dissenters have cried with Cassius, “Now is it Rome indeed, and Rome enough.” It was Rome without the ceremonies and canonical panoply, but it was Rome monopolized. The heads of other protestant denominations met to protest against the injustice. The words “a protestant clergy” excluded the dissenters, whom all imperial statutes ignored; but the presbyterians stood boldly up and proved that they came within the meaning of the words. The law officers of the Crown, on pondering the question said the Presbyterians were correct in their view, and that the benefit of the act should extend to “these persons, so long as there were any of them in the country.” The language of the officers might be taken to refer to moose or bears, but it really did point to “the presbyterians.” The sturdiest advocate for the maintenance of the reserves was Dr., afterwards Bishop, Strachan, one of the ablest men that has ever appeared in Canada, and an uncompromising champion of the church of his second love. He resisted the claims of dissenting bodies—“pretensions” he called these claims—and hurried away to England to fortify the colonial office against the importunities of the outraged denominations. In 1836, Sir John Colborne was recalled to England, but before his departure endowed forty-four rectories to the unspeakable amazement and indignation of the province. To each such rectory was allotted about three hundred and eighty-six acres of land. The law officers in England promptly declared the endowment to be invalid, but Dr. Strachan got together a bundle of documents which he packed off to England; whereupon the oracles reversed their decision.

It must certainly have been annoying to officials of the British Government to be pestered about every little colonial matter, but they brought the trouble upon themselves by arrogantly, not to say, impertinently, undertaking to deal with matters which rightly belonged to the jurisdiction of the colonial legislatures, in framing our constitutional acts. Nor had they grown more wise, perhaps we should say less meddlesome, in 1840. The Union Act provided that no further reservations were to be made—as if the Canadian government were not the best judge whether more reservations ought to be made or not—and that, of previous sales of reserves, one-third should go to the presbyterian body and two-thirds to the church of England; and that of the future proceeds of sales, one-third should go to the episcopalians, one-sixth to presbyters, and the remainder “for purposes of public worship or religious instruction in Canada.” This latter citation was an insinuation in favour of the dissenters; for the framers of the act could not be expected to name the Baptists, Wesleyans, Unitarians, et cætera. But this settlement of the question, proposed doubtless by the spiritual peers, was made without any regard for the census, and at once caused a cry of anger and dissatisfaction through the country. We know not by what light went the peers when making the appropriation. It is their custom when choosing a bishop, we know, to pray to be guided in the choice they are about to make, and then to appoint the person named by the prime minister. It is not certain that in apportioning the reserve proceeds among the Canadian religious bodies they gave much time to thought or prayer, simply setting down double as much to the episcopalians, whether they numbered ten or ten thousand, as to any other denomination. Four years afterwards, discontent at the settlement had reached such a head that a complete secularization of the reserves was demanded by the reform party. The question was discussed on the hustings and in the legislature with much passion, and Mr. Henry Price, a congregationalist, at his place in the house, described the reserves, with not less justice than force, as "one of the greatest curses that could have been inflicted upon the land." But the tories showed no inclination to disturb the arrangement. On the contrary, to them, like to the framers of the act of 1791, establishment was one of the dearest features of our government. When the reformers came into office in 1848, the champions of secularization were filled with hope; but as we have seen, Mr. Baldwin, although opposed to the union of church and state, or rather of God and Mammon, had enough of high church prejudice to be content to let the settlement by the union act abide. In Lower Canada the question was never of any consequence, and for this reason M. Lafontaine was opposed to opening up the matter again. We shall discuss, in its proper place, the influence it had upon parties, how it split governments, begot coalitions, and changed the whole current of our political history.

But if the lower province was not concerned about the clergy reserves, it had a grievance scarce less exasperating. In the seventeenth century the feudal system still existed in France, and was transferred, though not in all its rigours, to Canada. Large blocks of land were granted by the West India Company to families of the crown, army officers and religious bodies, who held them en seigneurie. This condition embraced the payment of fealty and homage to the king. On the day set apart for doing homage, came the seigneur, or holder of the granted lands, to the castle of St. Louis in Quebec, and kneeling before the representative of the king, he there, in token of submission, delivered up his sword; which was graciously returned. Nearly all the fertile lands, stretching, for three hundred miles, along the banks of the St. Lawrence were granted to the seigneurs. The latter enjoyed many rights and privileges, but they also had their duties. Within their domains they had jurisdiction over all offences against the laws save treason and murder. When the seigneurie or any portion of it was sold, a fifth of what it brought, called a quint, was paid to the crown. Being unable to cultivate his extensive grant, the seigneur divided it into lots having a frontage of three acres on the St. Lawrence, extending backward eighty acres. The holders of these lots which were granted en roture, were called censitaires. Several annoying conditions were imposed upon the censitaire. He was obliged* “to grind his grain at the seigneur’s mill, bake his bread in the seigneur’s oven, work for him one or more days in the year, and give him one fish in every eleven for the privilege of fishing in the river before his farm.” He was also obliged to pay a small yearly rental, to do military service, to open up and repair roads, and build bridges. If he sold his lot he was obliged to hand over lods et ventes, that is, the twelfth part of the receipts, to the seigneur. The holding descended to the censitaire’s heir, whose relations to the seigneur remained the same as during the original occupation. Some years after the conquest the censitaires became restive under the increased obligations put upon them by the seigneurs, who, in consequence of the system of dividing the seigneurie among all members of the family, were driven to sore straits to maintain a living suitable to their rank. At the time reformers in Upper Canada were demanding a secularization of the clergy reserves, the wretched censitaire was praying to be released from the yoke of his master. Accounts are given of the most dishonest and harassing measures adopted towards the ignorant habitant, who was not aware that he was being cheated—only knowing that he was being oppressed—by the seigneurs. Some hot-headed Frenchmen, without any instinct of justice, advocated the total sweeping away of seigniorial claims without compensation; others advocated a joint commutation of what was called the cens et rentes by the state and the censitaires; and the legislature in 1849 passed an act providing for optional commutation. This measure, however, did not satisfy the habitant, who demanded that the system should be abolished branch and root. Thus the legislature had upon its hands at the period to which our narrative has reached, two important, or, to use the phrase of the time, two “burning” questions.

Mr. Francis Hincks, the leader of the government asked to grapple with these questions, was the youngest son of Dr. Hincks, of Breckenborough, Yorkshire, England, and could trace his ancestry far backward, finding a Hincks as alderman of Chester in 1341. Dr. Hincks obtained a fellowship in Trinity College, Dublin, and subsequently became rector of Killyleagh. He was the author of a number of papers on the transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, and on Assyrian, Persian, and Egyptian archæology. Some of his discoveries proved valuable additions to the knowledge of Eastern lore, and chief among these may be mentioned his determination of the value and forms of the Assyrian numerals. After spending some years at college, his son Francis entered a large business house, and subsequently sailed as supercargo to the West Indies, visiting Jamaica, Trinidad, Demarara, and Barbadoes. In the latter city he met a Canadian gentleman with whom he visited Canada, for the purpose of studying her commerce. He went back to Ireland, well pleased with the new country, married the second daughter of Alexander Stewart, a merchant of Belfast, and soon after returned to Canada, taking up his residence in Toronto. He rapidly rose in the estimation of all with whom he came in contact for his great abilities and integrity; and after the arrival of Lord Durham to Canada, established the Examiner newspaper. As a journalist he was seen to possess abilities of the highest order, and while he fearlessly sifted every question to the bottom, his style of writing always maintained the due dignity of the press. In 1841 he was “called out” for Oxford, and defeated his opponent by a majority of thirty-one votes; and was re-elected on going back to his constituency after having accepted the inspector-generalship. Three years later he was defeated by a son-in-law of Admiral Vansittart for the same constituency, but in 1848 was again elected by a majority of three hundred and thirty-five over his old opponent Carroll. Again he entered the government of his first friend in Canada, taking the same office he had held before. In the autumn of 1851, as we have seen, on the retirement of Robert Baldwin, he was called to form a government. He is to be an interesting figure for some years to come, and we must not anticipate his career.

M. Augustin Norbert Morin, his “other half,” as the second government head used to be called in those days, was born at St. Michel, district of Quebec, in 1803. He studied law in the office of D. B. Viger, and was called to the bar at Montreal, in 1828. In his twenty-eighth year he was returned to parliament, and was so brilliant as to fill his friends with great hopes for his future. He entered the Baldwin-Lafontaine ministry as commissioner of crown lands, in October, 1842, retaining office until December the following year, when, with his colleagues he was forced out of office by the treachery of the governor. In 1848 he was again returned to parliament, and elected to the speakership. On the resignation of M. Lafontaine, three years later, Mr. Hinck's choice fell upon him as the only suitable successor to the retiring statesman. Kaye, whose portraits are not always above suspicion, pays honest tribute to the character of M. Morin. His administrative abilities, he tells us, were of the highest class. He had vast powers of application, rare conscientiousness, and a noble self-devotion, which in old times would have carried him cheerfully to the stake. His patriotism was of the purest water, and he was utterly without selfishness and guile. And he was of so sensitive a nature and so confiding a disposition, that it was said of him he was as tender-hearted as a woman, and as simple as a child.

A prominent figure in the new cabinet, a man who as yet had no clear notion of what his party leanings were, was Etienne P. Taché, receiver-general. He was the descendant of an ancient and distinguished French family, and was born at St. Thomas, Lower Canada, in 1795. When the war broke out in 1812, young Taché entered the militia of Lower Canada as an ensign in the 5th battalion, and dashed bravely to the front in defence of his country. After the war had closed, he studied medicine and achieved much success in his profession. He was elected to the first parliament under the union, and six years later was appointed deputy-adjutant-general, which position he retained for two years, when he entered the Lafontaine-Baldwin ministry as commissioner of public works. On the resignation of L. M. Viger the following year, he became receiver-general, and was allotted to the same office on the formation of the Hincks' ministry. Henceforth Mr. Taché began to evince preferences for the conservative party, and was during his term of office in the reform government a professed admirer of Mr. John A. Macdonald. We shall see that he soon boldly goes to the party whither his sympathies had been leading him, and stands at the head of a government with the member whom it was his wont so warmly to admire.

The election was held in the early winter, and resulted in a return of all the new ministers. The position of parties was little changed, save indeed that the only member of the once mighty compact who took his place in the new house was Sir Allan MacNab, and he only won his seat by repudiating many of the principles which he had been in the habit of defending with much fury. One of the surprises of the election was the rejection of the honoured ex-leader of the reform party by the electors of North York for a candidate who up to the time had been unknown to the electorate. The fact is that the public mind had been excited during the summer about the question of secularization, and the suspicion got abroad that Mr. Baldwin looked upon the disturbance of the existing settlement with no friendly eye. And so when he appeared at the hustings a throng of his friends waited upon him, and bluntly requested him to pledge himself to support secularization. It is not strange that Robert Baldwin should receive a request like this with scorn. He calmly told his supporters that he came before them with no claim upon their regards save what a record of his public career had given him; that he had always acted unfettered by pledges, free to do what he believed was right; that he would not fetter himself now, and if they sent him to the legislature he would go there free of pledges. They rejected him, and took the unknown.

John A. Macdonald, whose popularity had flagged not since his first election, was returned again for Kingston, but took his seat not in that listless manner which was his wont, but sat up at his desk, his eye upon every movement that was made. Mr. John Sandfield Macdonald, who was burning for an opportunity to be avenged on Mr. Hincks, was elected speaker. The Speech made reference to the proposed introduction of decimal currency, to railways, the attitude of the imperial government towards secularization of the clergy reserves, and the expediency of settling the grievance of seignorial tenure.

Some life was introduced into the debate on the address by George Brown, who made his maiden speech—a slashing and effective effort, and perhaps as forcible an array of raw material as had ever been presented to that parliament. In after years Mr. Brown's style of parliamentary speaking improved, but not very much. This first speech of his revealed all his strength, and not a few of his defects. He had a prodigious capacity for getting facts together, and these he flung with a tremendous force in the face of his audience. Only the one qualification of an orator had he, however, and that was this force, a quality which was perhaps made better by having to it a nervous side. It was homely, blunt speech, strongly made, and that was all. It lacked all the accomplishments and many of the gifts which are essential to oratory. It was devoid of imagination, of sarcasm, of humour, of irony, of pathos, of scorn. We know that facts can be honestly and effectually told without these gifts and graces, but we are merely pointing out that it is a delusion to suppose that Mr. Brown was an orator. He was a man of much honest purpose, of rugged, strong intellect; so rugged as to give room for the supposition that his muscle may have been turned into brain without having undergone any particular change. The true orator understands human nature, the sympathies of audiences, and as he speaks keeps his hand upon the pulse of his hearers. Mark Antony subdued and turned into zealous friends upon the spot a mob of turbulent Romans, drunk with tumult, by appealing to all the better instincts of their humanity. That oration of his, hidden away in the play, is, in our poor judgment, the greatest speech, the most effective piece of oratory that lives in any language, though he who utters it declares (but in the disclaimer proves the contrary), "I am no orator as Brutus is, but, as you know me all, a plain, blunt man that loves his friends." George Brown was a decidedly plain, blunt man, but it is doubtful if he always loved his friends ; and if he did he surely had not always tact enough to tell them so. He plunged straight on, without art or grace, believing it to be his duty to drive instead of to lead.

Papineau made an erratic attack upon the government, and declared that he wanted annexation and an elective legislative council. Mr. John A. Macdonald, who had informed some of his friends that “at last he was ready for the fray,” administered a long scourging to the government. He affirmed that the ministry had outlived its principles, and that its only bond of union now was that of office. Frequent meetings of the conservatives were held at which it was agreed that the party should act in accord with Brown’s stalwarts when any blow was aimed to overthrow the government.

During the summer Mr. Hincks had visited England, and while there made every possible effort to induce the imperial government to introduce such legislation as would give the Canadian parliament authority to deal with the question of secularization. Notwithstanding these facts, George Brown charged him with having “sold himself to the enemy,” and upon this asseveration grounded his opposition to the government. The truth is, Mr. Hincks’ real offence was that he had ignored Brown in forming his cabinet, and now stood in the path of a man who had told the public with a flourish but a few months before that he was “aiming for high game.” If this is not the true interpretation, then it remains to be explained why Brown had no censure for Messrs. Baldwin and Lafontaine, one of whom, at least, was known to be hostile to secularization ; why he scourged the clear grits in his newspaper for jeopardizing the interests of the party, and saw nothing censurable in the conduct of the government till he found he had not been remembered in the formation of Mr. Hincks’ cabinet. The interests of the reform party were always dear to Mr. Brown, but not so dear as his own ambition. In the whole course of his public career, he never hesi-tated to crush any man who crossed his path. If the interests of his party happened to be identical with the interests of his rival, then so much the worse for the party. It was not that he loved his party less, but that he loved George Brown more.

Owing to the prevalence of cholera in Quebec, the legislature was adjourned from November till February. A few days before prorogation, news reached Canada that a measure relating to secularization had passed the imperial parliament. The act authorized the Canadian legislature to repeal or amend the act of 1840 as was deemed desirable, but prohibited interference with the annual stipends already allowed to clergymen. Evidently, up to this date, the impression had not got out of the heads of some of the law-makers that our legislature here was largely composed of the barbarian element. They could not trust the few clergymen interested in this legislation to our hands for justice!

During the summer, the celebrated Alessandro Gavazzi, of whom we have already made mention, arrived in Canada for the purpose of destroying the papacy. He lectured in Quebec, but a number of lawless ruffians, defenders of the Catholic faith we suppose they styled themselves, broke up the meeting. Thence Gavazzi passed to Montreal, and while addressing an audience in Zion Church there one evening, a mob of Roman Catholic Irishmen, also on the defence of religion, endeavoured to force its way into the building. This was prevented by a force of police outside, but as the mob was drawing back, one of them fired a pistol. This rioter was promptly shot down by a protestant. The lecture was hurriedly brought to a close, but during the progress of the audience through the street it was assaulted by the mob, which was largely composed of murderous and half-drunken navvies. Two women were struck to the ground and trampled over; and a child of nine years had its arm broken. Mayor Wilson now appeared from behind the scenes and ordered the military to fire. The order was obeyed, but the balls went only among the procession whose offence had been that they attended Gavazzi's lecture. Five men dropped dead from the volley, and a large number were wounded. In the excitement the mayor evidently lost his head, though his action in ordering the soldiers to fire seems like an appalling murder. Unfortunately for Mr. Hincks he was on terms of great intimacy with Wilson, who was a Catholic. The government was tardy in investigating the occurrence, and its enemies told it on their trumpets throughout Upper Canada that Mr. Hincks was in the hands of the Catholics. The accusation seemed so much like the truth that it contributed in no small degree to the premier's downfall.

During the session Mr. John A. Macdonald was the most prominent figure in the debates. Upon the bill to increase the number of representatives, he took strong grounds, contending that the measure was a sacrilegious laying of hands upon the constitution, without the sanction or desire of the people.* Against the University Bill, he took a firm stand, but a perusal of his speech shows that his objections are well taken, and that much of his hostility to the measure was due to a conviction that Dr. Rolph was personally interested in the government bill. During the discussion on a measure to restrain the sale of intoxicating liquors, he took the position that the government could no more legislate a man to be sober than it could to make him religious. The law against duelling, he pointed out did not prevent "meetings," and the practice of the duel existed till the moral force of the community frowned it out of existence. The bill for indemnity to seigneurs he attacked with fierce scorn, not that he believed compensation should not be made for the confiscation of seigneuries, but that as the measure was one of local interest only, the burthen of indemnity ought not to be borne by the people of Upper Canada. "It was as much as saying," he pithily observed, "that Upper Canada should be bribed with her own money." The premier seems to have been the chief object of his care during the session. Scarce a day passed that there was not a passage of arms between the two. One afternoon Mr. Hincks was asked to distribute copies of the bill creating a bureau of agriculture, among members, but curtly refused to do so. Macdonald rose in his place: "Mr. Speaker, the inspector-general, in answer to a proper request from this house, says 'we won't.' Sir, it is absolutely indecent." Mr. Hincks who was rather surprised at seeing Macdonald show any trace of peevishness, arose and said that there was surely nothing indecent in saying, "we won't." "Ah, yes," said Mr. Badgley, "but it is the manner." "The manner," returned Macdonald, contemptuously; "he has no manners." "Why, is it possible!" said several members at once, "that Macdonald has lost his temper." "Nonsense," he replied, "I was never cooler in my life." He seemed to be in his element glancing along the benches of the doomed ministry and taunting its members. From being silent and nonchalant, he had become active and provoking. No joint in the enemy's harness escaped his eye; the memorandum books were thrown aside, and he sat there another Attila. Attorney-general Drummond, in defending the charitable societies bill, had wandered away from his text, and indulged in some jubilation at the strength of the government. "Ah, yes;" Macdonald said, when Drummond sat down, "they had much reason to be joyful about their majority. You have a majority of six votes," he went on; "and you have at least eight ministers. So deduct the votes of these eight gentlemen for themselves, and there is a majority of two against them!" There was a time, he admitted, when he had some respect for them, "but I have none now. The hon. member for Kent (George Brown), has ungritted you. You are now an unfortunate incoherent mass at the mercy of everybody and everything." We find the Kingston member attending a meeting held at Montreal during the summer, by the protestant citizens, in relation to the Gavazzi riots, and observe in his conduct there the caution that has always been part of his character. He was called upon to speak, but said a few words only, assuring the meeting of his sympathy with their object, but declining to say anything further, as “the matter was to be brought up in parliament.”

On the eighteenth of June, in this summer, the Globe winds up a dreary article with the earnest prayer, that “the country may be saved from the darkness of Romanism.” Mr. Mackenzie has, however, said in his book that “no article ever appeared in the Globe, that bore the character of intolerance.”

CHAPTER XI.

BIRTH OF "LIBERAL-CONSERVATISM."

"IF Russia should decline to restrict within purely diplomatic limits the discussion in which she has for some time past been engaged with the Sublime Porte, and does not by the return of the messenger, who is the bearer of my present letter, announce her intention of causing the Russian troops under Prince Gortschakoff to commence their march with a view to recross the Pruth, so that the provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia shall be completely evacuated on April 30, next, the British government must consider the refusal or the silence of the cabinet of St. Petersburg as equivalent to a declaration of war, and will take its measures accordingly." Such was England's ultimatum to Russia despatched on the 27th April, 1854. The messenger was informed by Count Nesselrode, four days after he delivered his errand, that the Emperor did not think it becoming in him to give any reply to the letter. A few days afterwards, a large assemblage of excited persons congregated about the Royal Exchange to witness the most interesting ceremony known in any country. The sergeant-at-arms, accompanied by several city officers, ascended the steps of the Exchange, and therefrom read Her Majesty's declaration of war against Russia. Foreign capitals which had so often said with a sneer that "England had joined the peace society and would never be seen in battle any more," stood aghast now listening to the clangor of her arms. But that sentiment sung by our first of Canadian singers, Mr. Roberts, still lived as the swords which had lain idly in their scabbards were buckled on, and the great ships were warped out from their moorings :

“ But let a great wrong cry to heaven,
Let a giant necessity come ;
And now of old she can strike,
She will strike, and strike home.”

The Canadian government had been growing weaker day by day, and while the great nations grappled with each other in their murderous conflict at the Crimea, a violent newspaper war was being waged throughout our province. It was in vain that the ministry asked to be judged by their works, and pointed out the valuable legislation they had called into existence. During the previous summer the Grand Trunk railway had been opened to Portland, the Great Western from Suspension bridge to Windsor, and the Ontario, Simcoe and Huron, now known as the Northern, from Toronto to Barrie. With the declaration of war the prices for Canadian products reached a fever point, labour was in brisk demand, and commercial prosperity at the flood-tide. The fly in Æsop's fable imagined that it was he who raised the dust-cloud, and not unnaturally ministers believed that their policy was in some measure the author of the extraordinary activity in trade ; but it was not.

For some time past Lord Elgin and his government had been conducting negotiations towards a treaty of reciprocity between Canada and the United States. In May, the governor and Mr. Hincks went to Washington to conclude the terms, but congress was busy with questions of greater moment, and our representatives were lost sight of for some weeks in the bustle. Opponents of the government ridiculed their mission, and prophesied the return of "our diplomats," as they contemptuously termed them, "with their tails between their legs." It created no little surprise among the prophets, and rejoicing through the commercial community, to learn that, on the 5th of June, the treaty had been signed by Lord Elgin on behalf of Great Britain, and W. L. Marcy, secretary of state for the United States, on behalf of the republic.

By the provisions of the treaty, citizens of the United States were permitted to take fish of any kind except shell-fish on the sea-coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbours and creeks of British provinces in North America, at any distance from the shore; and to land upon the shores to dry their nets and cure their fish. In return for these privileges British subjects were allowed the same concessions in all the waters and upon the land of the eastern sea-coasts and shores of the United States, north of the 36th parallel of north latitude. Grain, flour, breadstuffs, animals, meats, poultry, fish, lumber, hides, hemp, ores of metals, manufactured tobacco, and some other articles were admitted into each country duty free. The navigation of the St. Lawrence and the Canadian canals was permitted to American citizens on the same conditions as to British subjects; and the latter were given similar rights on lake Michigan. No export duty was to be levied on any lumber cut in districts in Maine, watered by tributaries of the St. John river, and floated down the latter to the bay of Fundy for shipment to the United States. The treaty was not to go into effect till it had received the sanction of the imperial and provincial parliaments on the one hand, and of the congress of the United States on the other. It was to continue in force ten years from the date of ratification, and one year after either party had signified a desire to terminate it. In Canada the treaty was received with a good deal of favour, but the people of the maritime provinces perused its terms with disappointment and anger. They charged Lord Elgin with hurrying away to Washington without understanding what were their most vital interests, and flippantly signing these away. *The objections raised to the treaty were, that though the United States had nothing to exchange comparable in value to the priceless fisheries of British North America, and though their ships were placed on an equality with the ships of Great Britain, they still peremptorily declined to concede the only equivalent they could offer, the admission of colonial vessels to registry in their ports and to their coasting trade. The treaty, it may be added, ran for thirteen years; and during this time the value of the aggregate of commodities interchanged between the two countries rose from an annual average of $14,230,763, in the eight years previous to the treaty, to $50,339,770, in its thirteenth year.

Parliament was called together on the 13th of June, the last day to which convocation could be postponed. It was impossible that the meeting could have been summoned for an earlier date, as the governor and the premier had been detained in Washington till the fifth of the month. But the opposition did not care about impossibilities, and declared that ministers were afraid to meet the house, and had put off the evil day to the utmost moment.

Political felling was once again at fever heat in Canada. The opposition press had carried on a flaming crusade against the ministry, charging it with treachery to the public, and hostility to secularization of the reserves and the confiscation of seigneuries. The Globe, and all the journals that followed its lead contended that it was the government's duty at the impending session to grapple with these questions; and Mr Brown wound up a very rampant editorial in support of this view by saying that Mr. Hincks "must secularize or go out." What the ministry's intention was had not transpired; and when the governor sat upon the throne to read the address, the house listened in breathless silence to hear what measures were promised. But it indicated only two; and neither of these referred to the reserves or seigniorial tenure. The house was merely informed that a bill would be prepared to give effect to the Reciprocity treaty, and another to regulate the franchise and amend the election act, passed the preceding session. We are unable to see at this day what other measures the ministry could have promised in the speech. During the preceding session provision had been made for an increase in the number of parliamentary representatives from 84 to 130. Clearly, then, from the moment parliament had declared for an increase in the number of representatives, the existing legislature was not fairly representative, and for a body, so deficient, to enact legislation affecting the interests of the public would have been a violation of the principle of responsible government. Mr. Hincks defended the action of the ministry on these grounds, and might have cited the precedent set by the imperial parliament in 1832 after the passage of the reform bill. We are unable to recall any instance worth noting of a departure from this doctrine in any country under responsible government. It is only a few months ago since Sir John Macdonald dissolved parliament after its fourth session, because the census had shown that its representation was not equitable. History by-and-by, when the party feeling of the hour shall have passed away, will not fail to approve his act; yet had the country rustic who stood aghast at the denunciation of Fox by a scurrilous hireling of the court arrived in Canada after Sir John Macdonald had announced this dissolution, he would have asked, as he asked in England, "'As 'e stole a sheep?" Even Mr. Edward Blake so far forgot the constitutional usage as to indite an extraordinary epistle to his constituents, in which he told them that the government having been beaten in a fair fight had resorted to "foul play." Now that Mr. Blake's little fit of excitement has blown over, he must bear to be told that it was no more correct to call a desirable and constitutional act "foul play," than to say that the government, against whom he issued his manifesto, had been "beaten" in any fight, fair or foul.

It was plain to the house that the intention of the ministry was to hurry through its measures and end the session speedily. But the conservatives, led by Sir Allan MacNab, and inspired by John A. Macdonald, joined themselves with the clear grits who followed George Brown, and the rouges who were a set of political Mamelukes. The address was stubbornly opposed inch by inch, and Mr. Hincks had the mortification of seeing men who stood fast to their allegiance all along now desert him on the ground that he had been unfaithful to his pledge. The man who goes through public life without some reproach clinging to his name, is as strange a spectacle as the Hebrew children who passed scathless through the fiery furnace. Rumour had a good many scandals upon her lips now, and the conduct of Mr. Hincks in certain transactions were said to be not above reproach. Ministers were therefore charged with infidelity and corruption; and the explanations they made were not sufficient before the house or the country.

Beyond any comparison their most powerful opponent was Mr. John A. Macdonald. His hostility was not shown to the constitutional ground the government had taken, but to their hesitancy in dealing with the questions which had set the country aflame. He did not take a stand either for or against the secularization of reserves and the abolition of tenure, but contended that the duty of the government was to have said yes or no to the public, and to stand or fall by their action. Apart from the shilly-shallying of the ministry, he formulated against them a number of grave charges of wrong-doing. As he proceeded with his speech he grew warm, and at last lost his temper. It was a strange sight to see him who never before had been stirred by discussion grow white with feeling, and gesticulate wildly with his arms. The government he said was now a reproach to the country. They had the contempt not alone of the party by which they had always been opposed, but by their own friends. "It was well known," he continued, "that the system pursued by the present government had been one of rampant corruption, appealing to the most sordid and the basest motives of men * * * * *

Even the postmaster-general had said at Perth, in reference to the purchase of government property by members of the government, that there had been a job perpetrated by his colleagues, with whom he continued to sit. Now, a government should be free from suspicion and feel a stain on their escutcheon like a wound on their person. Especially should they keep their hands clean of any speculation in the government property.* All honour, he said, had departed from them, and the only bond by which they were kept together now was "the bond of common plunder." Nor were these shortcomings either confined to one, or two, or three odious transactions; "they were steeped to the very lips in infamy;" were "tainted with corruption, collectively and individually, both in their public and private characters." During the delivery of this speech the wildest excitement prevailed in the house, and ministers "shivered at their benches." The attack was all the more effective coming from a man whose balance of temper the house never before had seen destroyed, and at an hour when the staunchest supporters of the ministry were dropping off. Fastidious critics censure Mr. Macdonald's "violent language" in his early career, but our impression is that outbursts like these have not been uncommon in debate among the staidest of parliamentarians. The very year before, Mr. Disraeli had suffered his temper to get the mastery, when, in a discussion with Mr. Gladstone, he informed Sir Charles Wood (Lord Halifax) that petulance was not sarcasm, nor insolence invective; and said that he "viewed Sir James Graham with regard, but not with respect." Some years before, at a public meeting, he denounced O'Connell as "a bloody traitor;" and the latter retaliated by characterizing Disraeli as the "true heir-at-law to the blasphemous thief that died impenitent upon the cross."

Among the amendments to the address were two by Messrs. Cauchon and Sicotte—in the drawing of which it is said Mr.

* See Appendix "E."

Macdonald had a hand. Mr. Cauchon's amendment expressed regret that the government had not taken steps for the disposal of the seigniorial tenure question during the session, and Mr. Sicotte's very adroitly added, "or one for the immediate settlement of the clergy reserves." Inasmuch as "settlement" might mean a confirmation of the status quo, or an agreement to the demands of the clear grits and rouges, these amendments were supported by the two latter parties, and by the conservatives; and the government found itself beaten by a vote of 42 to 29. The vote being really one of non-confidence, Mr. Hincks promptly adjourned the house for two days, and the ministry hurried together to discuss a way out of the dilemma. The conservatives and clear grits each held its separate caucus the following day, and at the latter's George Brown was jubilant as he saw the "higher game" now almost within his reach. At the other meeting was no exultation; but there sat the cool, shrewd-headed Macdonald, pointing out that now since the crisis had come, their party should move with more prudence and caution than ever. It was clear to him, he said, that no ministry could be formed, even after an appeal to the people, without the coalition of some two of the parties. Sir Allan MacNab, as was his wont, became excited and talked extravagantly, but Macdonald reminded him, that they could "afford now to sit and see them flounder in the net." "There is no way for them out of it," he assured his colleagues. Meanwhile no one outside of those who sat at the ministerial conclave knew what the government would do on Thursday next. When the day came the house met at the stated hour, and members, some with anxious, others with curious, and not a few with gratified faces took their seats at their desks. But the speaker had hardly taken his place when the house was startled by the booming of cannon; and the conviction flashed upon uninformed members that the governor was on his way to prorogue parliament. Sir Allan MacNab jumped to his feet and asked the ministry if it was possible that the government had decided on an immediate prorogation. Mr. Morin said yes, by a simple inclination of his head. "Then," replied the knight trembling with excitement, "I protest in the name of the opposition against our being broken up in this manner. I declare, on behalf of myself and my friends, that we are quite prepared to make a respectful reply to his excellency's speech, that we are ready to pass a bill bringing the new franchise act into operation, and to grant the necessary supplies for the current year." Sir Allan had no sooner sat down than William Lyon Mackenzie, almost speechless with rage, arose and began an attack upon the ministry. After pouring out his wrath upon the government he asked permission to introduce a bill on the clergy reserves; but while insisting on having his motion put the knocking of black-rod was heard at the door, and the sergeant-at-arms appeared before the bar communicating the fact to Mr. Speaker. Then arose a general confusion, a dozen members endeavoured to make themselves heard at once. Some members could be understood through the din to say, that black-rod must wait at the door till the house was prepared to send him his answer. Mr. Mackenzie, who had maintained his place on the floor the while, now sat down, and Mr. Macdonald arose, and began to speak with great vehemence. He declared, that of all the disgraceful acts of which the government had been guilty, this last was the worst. It was, he affirmed, an unlawful and indecent use of the power in their hands to prevent the public from investigating their corrupt actions before the election. While he was yet speaking, Mr. Mackenzie, taking the motion he had written, from his desk, walked with it to the speaker's chair. Mr. Sherwood arose to a question of order. The messenger, he said, had been admitted without the consent of the house. Mr. Macdonald, who still remained standing said he stood there to protect the liberties of the people of Canada. Here the uproar, in the words of the newspapers of the day, became tremendous; Macdonald speaking at the top of his voice, but being quite inaudible, and the speaker standing up also as if to speak. The sense of the house, however, began to return to it, and the "faithful commons" eventually proceeded to the court-house where the legislative council held session and the governor was waiting.

While reading the incidents of this memorable morning many will ask, But how could a dissolution be declared, since the passage of at least one bill through both branches of the legislature was necessary to constitute a session? So queried, too, the speaker in whose eyes now shone the light of triumph as he nervously fingered a slip of paper he carried in his hand. He had sat in the chair passionless and impartial since his election, but there always burnt in his breast the desire to be revenged on Mr. Hincks for having refused to him the attorney-generalship. As Speaker it was his duty to call attention to any infringement of constitutional usage by the government or the house, and he now saw the time at hand when he could take revenge on the premier. The governor sat on the vice-regal chair awaiting the appearance of the commons, and when the Speaker reached the bar put out his hand to the secretary for his speech. But he hesitated and a look of astonishment came over his face, for the Speaker had unfolded the paper with which his fingers had been nervously toying as he walked over to the court house, and in a bold tone in which one could catch the feeling of subdued triumph, read: "MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,—It has been the immemorial custom of the Speaker of the commons house of parliament to communicate to the throne the general result of the deliberations of the assembly upon the principal subjects which have employed the attention of parliament during the period of their labours. It is not now part of my duty to address your excellency, inasmuch as there has been no act passed or judgment of parliament obtained. The passage of an act through its several stages, according to the law or custom of parliament solemnly declared applicable to parliamentary proceedings by a decision of the legislative assembly of 1841, is held to be necessary in order to constitute a session of parliament. . This we have been unable to accomplish, owing to the command which your excellency has laid upon me to meet you this day for the purpose of prorogation ; and at the same time I feel called upon to assure your excellency, on the part of her majesty's faithful commons, that it is not from any want of respect to yourself or to the august personage whom you represent in these provinces, that no answer has been returned by the legislative assembly to your gracious speech from the throne."

This address was also read in the French language, and Mr. Fennings Taylor tells us that as his excellency listened to what he regarded as an act of censure upon his ministers and a reprimand to himself, his countenance displayed deep displeasure and annoyance. He recovered his calm, cool aspect very soon, however, and read a brief speech announcing an immediate dissolution of parliament.

Political affairs had now reached a puzzling state. There were three parties in the field, the ministerialists, led by Mr. Hincks, the conservatives, by Sir Allan MacNab, and the clear grits, by George Brown. No one of these parties could hope to be returned in sufficient strength to form a government ; so that to close observers the only way out of the difficulty was in coalition. The choice of the conservatives was between joining their forces with the ministerialists, whom they were now savagely assailing on the hustings and through the newspapers for corruption and incompetency, and the clear grits. To the government no choice presented itself : they could not seek coalition with men who had told upon trumpets that they were "steeped to the very lips in infamy," nor could they on the other hand submit themselves to the intolerable tyranny which Mr. Brown had set up in his newspaper ; so they went to the polls in a sort of sullen despair. The most jubilant politician at that election was George Brown, for he believed that the hour of office was at hand. He was led away by the delusion that either one of the other two parties in the field would readily join its forces with his own; but he did not see himself as others saw him. At the very time that he went about among his followers in a storm of jubilation, telling them that their day was coming, both of the parties, either of whom he thought would coalesce with him on the hint, were pondering how they could get into office without making such a compact. Fanny Squeers supposed Nicholas Nickleby smitten of her because he talked with her over the tea; and she went abroad to announce an "engagement," forgetting that it takes two parties to a contract. Much like Fanny Squeers was George Brown at this election. He was doubtful whether Mr. Hincks could be bullied or libelled into submission to his will, and so concluded to ally himself with the conservatives. To the astonishment of the latter party and everybody else he began to coquet with his ancient enemies privately, and to support them in the Globe. Like Fanny Squeers, he did not deem two parties to the engagement necessary. Because he was willing to form a compact with the conservatives he believed they were ready to coalesce with him. Mr. Brown may have been anxious to see a secularization of the reserves—no doubt he was—but above all other things he desired to get into power. So eager was he for office, and so little did the hereditary evils of toryism count compared with the capture of his own "higher game," that he gave warm support in the Globe and on the platform to no less conservatives than MacNab, Macdonald and Cayley, opposing the ministerial candidates. This portion of Mr. Brown's career Mr. Mackenzie finds the most difficult of all to whitewash over. But it needs only a few extracts from the biographer's book to show how effectually it resisted his treatment. "That Mr. Brown ever expressed an unqualified wish for the success of the tories," he says on page 32, "is not only without foundation but so palpably absurd as to require no contradiction." On page 52, a contradiction comes, and it is made by himself. He says: "Mr. Brown gave his support in certain cases to candidates of the conservative type on the ground that there was nothing to be hoped from the ministry." We have made the italics in the last quoted passage. It would not have accorded with the opinions so strongly put forward by Mr. Mackenzie, to have it stated that Mr. Brown supported such conservatives as Macdonald, MacNab and Cayley, so by a suggestio falsi the writer tries to leave the impression that support was given only to some indifferent politicians who really might,—and this was a generous admission on the part of the writer!—be regarded of the "conservative type." Keep still in mind who were the "candidates of the conservative type," and then turn to the next page of Mr. Mackenzie's book: "The new government was savagely assailed by the Globe. No one could expect that a government in which the names of J. A. Macdonald, Sir Allan MacNab and Mr. Cayley appeared, could be other than hostile to the determined demands of the Upper Canadian people!" We are not dealing with Mr. Mackenzie as an historical writer now: that is out of the question; but we are merely showing how unskilled he is, after all his attempts, in the use of whitewash. Were we to show the value of his statements as an impartial historian, we would merely quote from the page preceding that containing the extract just given: "Mr. Hincks was entitled to the discredit of forming a new combination with the tories." In view of Mr. Brown's attempt and failure to form "a new combination with the tories," the discredit of having succeeded in doing so fell to Francis Hincks? That is it we suppose. Mr. Mackenzie also forgets that Mr. Hincks waived his personal claims, and that Robert Baldwin wrote from his quiet retreat at Spadina strongly endorsing the coalition and the course of Mr. Hincks.

Parliament was summoned for the 5th of September. For days before the opening intense excitement in political circles prevailed at the capital; and several caucuses were held, some by each party alone, and others by the conservatives and clear grits together. The plan agreed on by the latter was, that both should unite to defeat the government. For the speakership there were three candidates, George E. Cartier, put forward by the ministry; John Sandfield Macdonald, by the clear grits, and Mr. Sicotte, by the Lower Canada opposition. When the governor-general had withdrawn, after saluting the new parliament, the clerk of the Assembly took the chair. The three candidates were then named, and after some hot discussion on the merits and claims of each, the clerk put the question, Shall Mr. Cartier be speaker? In reply, 62 said nay, and 59 yea. Mr. Sicotte was proposed next, when the clerk told the yeas to rise; but only a comparative few stood up. It was plain to the house that the speakership was to fall to John Sandfield Macdonald. But there sat on a ministerial bench a member who, with all his fire and feeling knew how to be cool, and he resolved that the man who had read the rebuke to the government at the close of the last parliament should not grace the Speaker's chair. The clerk counted Mr. Sicotte's supporters, and was about to call for the nays, when Mr. Hincks, with flashing eye, sprang to his feet. "Put me with the yeas," he said, and immediately the entire body of his followers also stood up. Mr. Sicotte was declared elected. When the buzz was over, Mr. Macdonald, the defeated candidate, half hissed a "thank you" across the house to the premier, and the latter answered him with an ironical bow.

The vote showed that the ministry did not possess the confidence of the house, yet, Mr. Hincks argued, as the vote had not been taken on a question of non-confidence, he need not resign till some other sign had been made. On the following day the governor-general came down and delivered his speech from the throne. Several important measures were promised, but nothing that ink and pen could put on paper would have saved the ministry. The latter now saw that there was nothing to be gained by postponing the evil day, and on Friday, the 8th instant, resigned. From the mass of political timber now afloat, the governor-general set about to select some one to form a ministry, and his choice fell upon Sir Allan MacNab.

But John A. Macdonald's was the head that planned the course to be pursued. Mr. Brown and one or two of his lieutenants were almost bursting with anxiety for several hours after it was learnt that the governor had called upon MacNab, expecting to be "waited on" and invited to enter the cabinet. But Mr. Brown was soon to find, like Fanny Squeers, that between himself and the conservatives there was no "engagement." A caucus of MacNab's party was held, at which John A. Macdonald was the most prominent figure. He pointed out that the sentiments of the old tory party had been now outgrown by the province, and that the true course was the medium line between effete toryism and the doctrine of the radicals. Alliance, he said, with the clear grits—which numbered about forty strong—was not to be dreamt of. Their policy was one of impetuosity and indiscretion, and their leader would tyrannize with his newspaper if he could not rule in the cabinet. With the liberal party, which had become detached from the extravagant members of the reform side, he said, the conservatives could, without any sacrifice of principle, and with much profit to the country, unite. The secularization of the clergy reserves; and the abolition of seigniorial tenure were questions, he added, upon which the country had expressed itself unmistakably; and it was the duty of the government to give effect to the popular wish.

While the discussions went on, and messages passed between Sir Allan and some of the ex-ministers, Mr. Brown's excitement had grown to a very high pitch, and every one who approached him, he fancied, brought a letter from MacNab. At last, to his utter consternation, he learnt that the conservatives were in communication with some of the ex-ministers, and later on, that a government had been formed, as follows

FOR CANADA WEST.

HON. SIR ALLAN MACNAB, President of Council and Minister of Agriculture.

HON. JOHN A. MACDONALD	-	-	-	-	Attorney-General.
" WM. CAYLEY	-	-	-	-	Inspector-General.

HON. A. N. MORIN	-	-	-	-	Commissioner of Crown Lands.
" L. T. DRUMMOND	-	-	-	-	Attorney-General.
" P. J. O. CHAUVEAU	-	-	-	-	Provincial Secretary.
" E. P. TACHÉ	-	-	-	-	Receiver-General.
" J. CHABOT	-	-	-	-	Commissioner of Public Works.

This was the famous MacNab-Morin government, the first liberal-conservative ministry formed in Canada, the combination in which were fused the staid and respectable liberal sentiment of the province, and the liberalized and broadened form of conservative opinion. With this coalition disappeared from the stage the historic reform party, the apostate reformers or grits, only remaining. Strictly speaking we have no "reformers" now; and those who call themselves such are the descendants of the baffled grits who set up a cry of rage when liberal and conservative sank a few imaginary differences, and blended into a party liberal enough to keep abreast of public opinion and conservative enough not to run into excess.

Meanwhile George Brown's excitement had passed away, and as we have it on the authority of Mr. Mackenzie that he was now anxious to see the reserves secularized, it is natural to suppose that he held his peace till he learnt what the policy of the new government was. But he did no such thing. In the words of Mr. Mackenzie himself, "the new ministry was savagely assailed by the Globe." After parliament had met Mr. Macdonald promptly introduced a measure dealing with the clergy reserves. This act abolished all distinctions between religious denominations by providing that the proceeds arising from all land-sales, after the deduction of expenses, be handed over to the municipalities in proportion to population, the amount to be applicable for ordinary municipal purposes. Another bill was introduced abolishing feudal rights and duties in Lower Canada, and allowing compensation to seigneurs in cases where vested rights had grown up under the tenure. Since the object of George Brown, according to the Globe and Mr. Mackenzie, was to have a settlement of the clergy reserves made, and since it was because of alleged dilatoriness on Mr. Hincks' part in settling this question that Mr. Brown seceded from the ministerialists, his support to a government which swept state-churchism away ought to follow as a matter of course. But it did not. On the contrary, the new ministry was still "savagely assailed by the Globe." It was not, after all, state-churchism so much that Mr. Brown cared about, though Mr. Mackenzie does not tell us so, but his failure to capture the "higher game." There was some astonishment among the fossil Tories at the stand taken by the new ministry; and John Hillyard Cameron, John W. Gamble and Edmund Turner were utterly scandalized and withdrew their august support. Some of the newspapers of the conservative side expressed regret, and others wonder. The Belleville Intelligencer said: "Who would have fancied that the knight of Dundurn and the Hon. Mr. Cayley would ever have surrendered their principles on the clergy reserve question. That the Hon. John A. Macdonald should have done so, does not astonish us, because we have long known his views upon this question, and that they had undergone considerable change, so far as its settlement would tend to allay the unnatural excitement which has so long agitated the country. Well, these men are to compose the ministry, with the French members, who were part and parcel of the Hincks' administration. So that the changes are confined to the upper part of the province, exclusively."

In the legislature the new ministry were subjected to some scathing criticism, and some of those who had not learnt to appreciate the force of the Duke of Wellington's maxim, that

"the Queen's government must go on," loaded conservative ministers with reproach for sitting in the same cabinet with men whom they had so lately denounced. Mr. Macdonald, of Glengarry, said, among other things, in a very long and windy speech: "Well, the house met after an adjournment of a year, and amendments to the address hostile to the administration were adopted. Charges of a very serious nature were brought against the administration. The honourable member for Kingston (Mr. Macdonald), who had now gone over to the other side, and was to be the administration leader, stood up in his place in this house and declared that the administration then in power were 'steeped in infamy to their very lips,' and that they were 'tainted with corruption collectively and individually, both in their public and private characters.' And yet within three months after, they found the gentleman who made use of that language, almost unparalleled in the annals of parliament, amalgamating with the administration which he had thus denounced! Could anything have happened which would have taken the people more by surprise?"

The Globe in a calm mood made an estimate of the new ministry, and said of Mr. John A. Macdonald: "Then we have Mr. attorney-general Macdonald, the only man of any working qualities in the government, the only one who can make a set speech in the house, the man who must be the leader in the assembly. Has Mr. Macdonald ever shown any tendency to reform principles? Was he not one of the most active members of the Metcalfe cabinet, the opponent of responsible government? Is he not known to hold the highest conservative views?"

This was the same "Mr. Macdonald" whom the Globe had supported when it saw hopes of a coalition with the Tories. It is needless also to say, that the inference we ought to draw from this statement, namely, that Mr. Macdonald was one of Metcalfe's ministers, is, like many other things published and spoken by Mr. Brown, incorrect. Mr. Macdonald did not enter the cabinet till after Metcalfe had left the country.

In December, Lord Elgin, who had lived to see the system of government advocated by his father-in-law in his masterly report* tried and proved successful, sailed for England. His after career was worthy of the man who so ably and fearlessly performed his duty in Canada in a time of perplexity and turmoil. After performing important services in China and Japan, and sitting for a time in Palmerston's cabinet as post-master-general, he was appointed to the vice-royalty of India. While making a progress through the north-western provinces, he was attacked with serious disease of the heart, and died under the shadow of the Himalayas, where, at his request, and in a spot selected by Lady Elgin, his remains were laid. His successor to the governorship of Canada was Sir Edmund Walker Head.

CHAPTER XII.

TACHÉ-MACDONALD.

SIR EDMUND W. HEAD, was born, in 1805, near Maidstone, Kent, England. He came of a distinguished and very ancient family which had for an ancestor Richard Head, baronet, in 1676. Edmund was educated at Oriel college, Oxford, where he took a first-class in classics, subsequently obtaining a fellowship in Mereton. Here he was appointed university examiner, and examined Lord Elgin, whom he was afterwards to succeed as governor-general of Canada, for a Mereton fellowship. An article of his published by the Foreign Quarterly Review, brought him to the notice of the marquis of Lansdowne—who had the honour of “bringing out” Macaulay under almost similar circumstances—and this nobleman prevailed upon him to study ecclesiastical law. He found, however, that theology was not his proper vocation, and, like his giddy-headed kinsman Sir Francis, entered a poor-law office as assistant-commissioner. In this department he acquitted himself with such excellent discrimination and high ability, that on a change of ministry, though the in-coming party were not of his school of politics, he was appointed chief-commissioner. The poor-law, however, grew into bad odour, though the conduct of the commissioner was beyond reproach, and the ministry was obliged to reconstruct it. It was felt by the government that a man of Sir Edmund’s ability and high character ought to have employment; and in 1848 they appointed him to the governorship of New Brunswick. This position he retained till 1854, when he was appointed governor-general of Canada. As will be seen by the record of Sir Edmund's Canadian administration, he was a man of a discerning mind and wide experience, who could not be coaxed or driven from the path of duty. Above all his sense of honour was so keen that no consideration could bring him to follow any course that was not in keeping with the dignity and impartiality of the position he held. We shall see him, as we proceed, in trying places, and hear him loaded with reproach for doing his duty. But the snake may crawl upon the spotless stone and cover it with slime, still the purity of the marble will outlive the defilement. Through all the slander and malignant abuse heaped upon Sir Francis during the years immediately to follow, the character of the man assailed stands forth to-day untarnished by any improper act during his administration.

The health of Mr. Morin now began to fail him and he longed to be out of the hurly-burly of political life and get upon the bench, a haven where all harassed statesmen believe "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." Mr. Morin's resignation disturbed the Lower Canada portion of the cabinet. Col. Taché took the place of the retiring leader, Mr. Drummond retained his old post, Francis Lemieux became commissioner of public works, Mr. Cauchon assumed charge of the department of crown lands, and, a man destined to play a prominent part in our history, George Etienne Cartier, was chosen provincial secretary. For some time past it appears Mr. Macdonald had strongly admired Mr. Cartier, while the latter was drawn with an irresistible force towards the attorney-general-west. It was then began that friendship, unique in the history of Canadian public men, between these two distinguished statesmen; a friendship that survived through the trial and the battle, but which, at least on the side of one, was shattered when both stood in the noonday of their fame, and after their greatest victories had been won.

Parliament met in February following in Quebec. In fancy then could be heard through Canada the ringing of sabres and the booming of cannon in the Crimea, and every noise increased the beat of the heightened public pulse. It was announced, too, that Great Britain would need every available soldier, and that a portion of the troops was to be withdrawn from Canada. The instinct of self-defence at once arose and found expression in the government's militia bill. This measure can only be justified in the light of a time when the air was full of the sounds of war. It provided for the formation of two great militia bodies, one to be called the sedentary, the other the active. The former was to include all the male inhabitants of the province between the ages of eighteen and sixty; the latter all those under forty years. They were to muster once a year for drill; and the cheeks of those who drew the bill flushed as they thought what a force this would be to hurl against an invader. Not unreasonably the opposition inveighed against the measure, charging the ministry with endeavouring to establish a standing army which they described as one of the greatest curses of a free country. The bill passed, however, and remained in force for about eight years. It may be called the parent of our present militia system. The government were fiercely opposed by the clear grits, and notably by George Brown and his lieutenants, William Lyon Mackenzie and John Sandfield Macdonald. Mr. Hincks rendered loyal support to his party, a lesson which some of the grit statesmen who have been so ready in their books to criticise the career of that gentleman would do well to bear in mind. Mr. Hincks had been superseded not more by conservatives than by his own party, but this did not prevent his cordial support of the coalition. It is not a hundred years ago since a certain party in Canada changed their leader, as we suppose they had a perfect right to do, whereupon a personal hostility grew up between the discarded and the newly chosen head; and they have since been barely able to maintain decent appearances. If the writers of some of our Canadian books would try to follow Mr. Hincks' example during the time under discussion, instead of criticising where there is nothing to censure, they would appear themselves, when their careers are over, brighter figures to succeeding book-writers. After the session closed Mr. Hincks went to England, and while there was appointed to the governorship of Barbadoes and the Windward Islands.

During the summer the question of denominational schools was discussed on the platform and through the press with a great deal of vehemence. Mr. Brown rode the protestant horse with much flourish through the country. The greater portion of Upper Canada was in favour of non-sectarian schools, while the people of the lower province would not hear of "banishing God from the class-rooms," and insisted on separate control. The government decided on maintaining the existing system; and their opponents said they were bondsmen to Rome. While every other question, after a too long bruited, lost its potency to stir the multitude up to tumult, the pope and Rome never once failed in its object. The mention of Rome was, at the time of which we are writing, to demagogues of George Brown's stripe—and George Brown, however many sterling qualities he may have possessed, was the arch type of a demagogue—what dynamite is now to the Russian nihilist and a wing of the Irish agitators.

Parliament opened at Toronto in February. During the debate on the address Mr. Brown made a slashing assault upon the government, charging ministers with infidelity to pledges, and disregard for the will of the people. On the night of Tuesday the 26th of February, some ministerialists remarked that the criticism of Mr. Brown might be correct and proper, but they doubted the judiciousness of such censorship by one who had coquetted with conservatives and supported their leaders at the late election, with a view to forming a coalition with their forces. John A. Macdonald, upon whom Mr. Brown had showered some indiscreet speech, sat at his desk smiling, and when an opportunity occurred arose to add his testimony to the remarks of the preceding speakers. In a half playful, yet half bitter way, he called attention to the difference between George Brown hopeful and George Brown disappointed. But notwithstanding that Mr. Brown had at first supported the reformers and then deserted them; and that he ridiculed the clear grits for forsaking their party, and afterwards became the leader of the clear grits himself; and though he tried to ally himself with the conservatives, and savagely attacked the reformers for succeeding where he had failed; yea, though he had, as we have already stated, supported MacNab, Macdonald and Cayley before the election, and ferociously assailed them after the election, because they would not coalesce with him, and after they had abolished state churchism—the thing for which he said he had been chiefly contending—notwithstanding, we say, all this, of all the sins in the political calendar the most hateful in his eyes was inconsistency. He rose trembling with excitement, and poured out a stream of invective on the government, taunting them with corruption, incompetency and dishonour; and with infidelity to their pledges and the people's trust. Once again temper got the better of the cool attorney-general west. He was observed to tremble and grow white at his seat, while Mr. Brown went on; and as the latter gentleman took his seat like a subsided volcano, Mr. Macdonald jumped up. It was some time before he could articulate distinctly, but when his voice grew clear and his nerves steady, there was no effort needed to catch his meaning. He accused Mr. Brown of having, while acting as secretary to a commission appointed some years before to investigate abuses said to exist in the management of the provincial penitentiary at Kingston, falsified testimony, suborned convict witnesses, and obtained the pardon of murderers in order to induce them to give false evidence. Such appalling charges coming from a minister of the government bewildered several members of the house, but others remembered that Mr. Macdonald had made similar charges years before, and believed that he had strong warrant for reiterating them now. In making these charges Mr. Macdonald is open to censure, not indeed for having, as Mr. Mackenzie meanly alleges in his book, preferred them knowing the same to be false, and under the belief that a certain document which alone could exonerate Mr. Brown, had been burnt at the Montreal fire; but in allowing an opponent to provoke him into gravely making charges that had been substantiated only by rumour. From all that can be gathered he did not assert the wrong-doing as having come within his personal knowledge, but repeated the charges in language of burning passion, and in the words employed by the lips of rumour. After Mr. Macdonald had taken his seat, Mr. Brown arose shivering with rage. He repelled the charge in fierce words, said he had taken down the attorney-general's statements, and would hold him responsible for them. The house was too much excited to proceed with other work, and the scene in the legislature was the topic for knots of persons in the street after adjournment. On the following day, Mr. Brown moved for a committee of enquiry and during the discussion Mr. Macdonald expressed his regret at the occurrence of the previous day, but maintained that he had strong reasons then, and still, for believing that the charges he had preferred against the honourable member for Lambton were not without foundation; though, he repeated, he had not spoken from personal knowledge. The committee brought in a report which neither convicted nor exonerated Mr. Brown, and the house passed a motion setting forth that: "Attorney-general Macdonald appears to have acted under a firm conviction of the truth of the charges made against Mr. Brown, and to have been justified in doing so by all the evidence within his reach." Mr. Mackenzie displays a great deal of malice in writing about this event, and endeavours to show that not only Mr. Brown's followers, but leading members of the government, reprobated the conduct of Mr. Macdonald. "It was remarkable" he says, "that one of Mr. Macdonald's colleagues, attorney-general Drummond, was candid enough to declare that there was no evidence criminating Mr. Brown. Sir Allan MacNab and other conservatives took similar ground and boldly stated their views." The truth of the matter is, both Sir Allan MacNab and Mr. Drummond were at this time hostile to Mr. Macdonald, and would lose no plausible opportunity to discredit him before the house. Sir Allan knew that the desire of all the cabinet members, save one or two, was to see Macdonald occupy the premier's seat; while Mr. Drummond had ambitions of his own, but saw that Macdonald was preferred before himself. Some time afterwards, when MacNab was forced out, and Col. Taché called in his place, the question of leadership in the assembly arose between Macdonald and Drummond, and because the former was chosen the latter withdrew from the cabinet in high dudgeon.

Another of Mr. Macdonald's quarrels during this session is worth recording. On a motion regarding the seat of government, Col. Rankin, who possessed an exasperating tongue, seemed disposed to create some tumult. About this time, stories of dissensions in the cabinet were on everybody's lip, and it was well understood that the government was sick of Sir Allan, and trying to be rid of him. As Col. Rankin proceeded with his speech it was evident that he was inspired by public rumour, and endeavouring to make his remarks as offensive as possible. He could not understand the course the government had pursued in the seat of government matter, he said. "If there was any point on which they ought to agree, he thought this ought to be one, and their not being able to take any decided course showed that they were unfit to hold office any longer. He was well aware that the tone of the remarks he was now making was not consistent with the manner in which he had spoken of the ministry on some former occasions, but it would be remembered that he had always maintained an independent position, and had never allowed himself to be described as a follower of the government; and though he had supported some of their measures, he never regarded them as men of a high order of talent: while anything of a complimentary nature which he had said about them was well known to have been said in irony. He would still support such measures as he approved of regardless of the quarter whence they emanated. In looking at the conduct of the government lately, he could not help thinking of a certain exhibition in Trafalgar Square, called the 'happy family,' which consisted of a collection of animals naturally the most hostile to each other, but which had been taught to appear before the public as the most harmonious in the world. But one could not help feeling that when the public eye was off them they would indulge in scratches and bites; and he thought the ministry were somewhat in the same position; for notwithstanding their professions of perfect harmony, no great question came up on which they had not some difference of opinion; and he had no doubt that in private, like the happy family, they indulged in some of those contests of which the house sometimes saw the symptoms." He was proceeding with some general reflections in the same tone, on the conduct of ministers, when he was called to order by the speaker. He then said that a more fitting opportunity would probably occur before long, to discuss the merits of the ministry, and of that he would not fail to avail himself. He then moved that Toronto is a most desirable place at which to establish the permanent seat of government in Canada.

When Col. Rankin ceased, Mr. John A. Madonald arose. He ridiculed the remarks of the colonel who, he said, had been describing happy families and like exhibitions, with such wit and gusto as would lead people to imagine that he must have been a showman himself; but he had not said anything of various other exhibitions that had been seen in London, such as Ojibeway Indians." He confessed, also, that he had gone so far as to compliment the government; but that had only been done in irony, and probably the motion he had just made was in irony too. He could not believe, however, that the hon. member was quite so bad as he had represented himself to be, and he thought that the remark must have been an after-thought, for the hon.

gentleman could never have been so insincere as to have voted on many occasions with the majority of the house contrary to his own convictions. These and other remarks which the newspaper reporters did not catch exasperated the colonel, and on attorney-general Macdonald taking his seat the former arose again and said he understood the attorney-general-west to allude to the exhibition of Ojibbeway Indians; but that was a respectable affair compared with the exhibition of ravenous animals to which he had compared the ministry; for it was well known that they were all plotting and counter-plotting against each other. He had previously believed the ministry to be possessed of the feelings of men of honour, but he found that there was among that ministry one person whom he could never regard with any feeling but that of unmitigated contempt. He never could regard with any other feeling any person who was guilty of a violation of truth. There was a person in the ministry whose conduct he could not describe in any language that would not be unparliamentary. The individual to whom he alluded was the attorney-general-west.

When the speaker had proceeded thus far an uproar arose through the chamber, and the cries of order! order! alone were distinguished above the din. In the midst of the tumult the clock struck six and the house arose, while the personal friends of the belligerent members surrounded each to prevent a collision. After the speaker taking his place at nearly eight o'clock, he rose and said he thought it to be his duty to call the attention of the house to the possibility of a collision taking place between the two hon. members who were engaged in controversy when he left the chair; and he thought, in order to prevent anything unpleasant taking place, that both gentlemen should be put under the custody of the sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. Chisholm said, if the language used by the hon. member for Essex, before the house adjourned, was to be permitted on the floor of that house, collisions would take place frequently, and he thought it right to call upon the hon. member offending to retract those words; else they ought to be taken down. Neither of the hon. members was now present, and it became the house to vindicate its own privilege, and to send for the belligerents and place them in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms. The interval which had elapsed between the adjournment and now, should have led the hon. member for Essex to have retracted.

Mr. Murney deemed it right for any hon. member in the opposition to state what he pleased, in a political way, to the hon. gentleman on the other side, and to do as the hon. member for Essex (Rankin) had fairly done. How had that hon. member been met? Why in a spirit of ridicule, and with the determination of insulting him.

The Speaker said it was not right to increase the pain of the house by such remarks. He himself had not acted very promptly in calling the attorney-general to order when he addressed the house, because he thought that the hon. gentleman did not go beyond what he (the speaker) thought was parliamentary language. To prevent further difficulty he must beg of the hon. member for Essex to retract the words he used.

Mr. Murney thought it to have been the desire of the attorney-general to insult the hon. member for Essex personally. He had listened with great pain to the speech of the hon. attorney-general-west, but he claimed for himself the right to say in that house all he wished with respect to the hon. gentlemen opposite, as to their political acts, and he dared their right to oppose this.

The Speaker said, if the house were to go on with this controversy, more trouble would ensue. He would propose a plan which would impute the fault to neither of the hon. gentlemen, namely, that they should both be placed under the custody of the sergeant-at-arms—(hear, hear, and sensation)—when, probably, the house would be in a better position to judge of their conduct, and it could adjudicate upon it. That would be the better way, without now discussing which was in the right and which was in the wrong. Mr. Macdonald came into the house after the discussion had been some time in progress, and very coolly offered advice to the Speaker as to what he ought to do with respect to the "two hon. gentlemen." Many members shook their heads and said that it would not pass away so quietly as this, and believed that the affair would end in a rencontre at ten paces. But in the words of Burke, "the age of chivalry had gone; that of sophisters, economists, and calculators had succeeded," and Messrs. Rankin and Macdonald fired no shots and had no "meeting."

It was now generally known that the rumours which Col. Rankin had repeated in the house, in such an offensive manner, were not without some foundation. Members of the cabinet did not try to conceal their desire to be rid of Sir Allan MacNab and to have a "younger and more capable member" of the council in his place. The younger and more capable member, we need not say, was John A. Macdonald, and though the conspiracy formed for the overthrow of Sir Allan was the spontaneous action of the greater number of ministers, we need not doubt that Mr. Macdonald himself had ambition to become the leader. He had sat calmly in the house through several sessions while the conservative party gradually went to pieces through lack of capable leadership, and seldom made a sign of impatience. He sat unbowed while the reform party towered above their opponents in numbers and prestige; saw that party pass away like the pageant in the Tempest isle; saw the conservatives come again to power, and, now, through inferior leadership, show a tendency to a second fall. He met the recalcitrant ministers at one of their "conspiracy gatherings," as Sir Allan passionately described the meetings. He was informed that his colleagues desired that he should become their leader, that doom awaited the government if Sir Allan remained at its head, and that the duty of the party's well-wishers was now to get rid of the premier. Mr. Macdonald is understood to have placed himself in the hands of his colleagues and to promise to assist in doing whatever they believed to be for the welfare of the government. Sir Allan at this time was a victim to gout, and was frequently unable to attend the meetings of council. It came to his ears that the ministry had resolved at a caucus to put Mr. Macdonald in his place, and his anger knew no bounds. When the paroxysm of his disease was over, he reviewed the condition of affairs, and found, with some exultation, that he was master of the situation. He was premier he told his friends, indeed blurted it out publicly, not by the suffrage of his conspirator colleagues, but of that of the governor. He even fancied that he might be able to dispense with the cabal altogether, and rally around him other men who would have sufficient following in the house to sustain the ministry. Presently the newspapers began to open fire upon him, telling him that he was a log in the path of progress, that he had been a good man in his time, but that his day was past; and urging him not to sully a fairly respectable career by becoming a nuisance at the end of his life. Against such a defection as this the old man was not proof, and he shed bitter tears as he resolved to offer a compromise. It was sufficient humiliation he felt to be forced out of the leadership, but it was intolerable that the man he regarded as the arch conspirator should succeed to his place. He met the ministers and informed them that he had made up his mind to resign; but on the condition that Mr. John Hillyard Cameron should succeed him. Mr. Cameron was an indifferent figure compared with the gentleman of the cabinet's choice, but he was not at all conscious of inferiority, and pressed himself forward with much earnestness. Although the ministry was now in a critical condition and staggered under the assaults of the opposition, its members resolved not to accept Sir Allan's offer. They could afford to wait till a change came, they said, which would not be long. It came sooner than they expected.

On the 17th day of October, the previous year, Robert Corrigan, a protestant, while attending a cattle show in the parish of St. Sylvestre, Quebec, had been attacked and brutally murdered by a gang of Roman Catholic Irishmen. In the following spring seven of the assailants were tried for the murder in Quebec; but in spite of the plainest and most overwhelming testimony, they were declared "not guilty." When the verdict became known a cry of indignation was raised through the protestant community of Canada; and it did not tend to allay the feeling when it was learnt that the jury trying Kelly and his fellow murderers was virtually packed, being composed exclusively of Roman Catholics, and that judge Duval, who presided, was also a Roman Catholic. When any great public wrong has been done, it eventually cries out from the parliament for redress. On Friday, the 7th of March, Mr. John Hillyard Cameron, who since his rejection by the anti-Mac-Nab ministers was not particular whether he embarrassed the government or not, moved an address to the governor for the production of a copy of judge Duval's charge to the jury. This address the motion affirmed,—and coming from a criminal lawyer of Mr. Cameron's standing, the asseveration startled the house—"contained statements which could hardly have been made by any man who had anything like a fair acquaintance with the manner in which the criminal law ought to be administered." The government was in a sore plight. They dared not commit themselves to any measure that cast an imputation on judge Duval's character, for the French Canadians made the judge's cause their own; while upon the other hand nearly every Upper-Canada member in the assembly demanded that the matter should be sifted to the bottom. On the night of the 10th, after three days' stormy debate, the motion was put and carried against the government by a vote of forty-eight to forty. Attorney-general Drummond hurriedly arose and moved an adjournment of the house.

On the following day ministers asked permission for a further adjournment of two days, and meanwhile endeavoured to bring together their sundered forces. During the term of grace they decided to present the address to the governor, and to subsequently have a friendly member move a want of confidence in the ministry. Though conservatives as well as reformers would have the disgraceful miscarriage of justice in Quebec investigated at much public sacrifice, they were not willing that the liberal-conservative ministry should give place to clear-gritism and newspaper tyranny; and when the motion of non-confidence was put they sustained the government. It is scarcely necessary to add that the governor did not produce judge Duval's address, for the good reason that it was not in his possession, and could not even be assumed to exist; while, if it did exist, he had not the power to compel its production.

The government, however, was shattered by the adverse vote on the Corrigan matter; and while yet engaged in healing the breaches, hon. John Ross resigned the speakership of the legislative council. This action was dictated by the attitude of the reform members in the cabinet, who pointed out to him that since the secularization of the clergy reserves had been accomplished the purposes of the coalition no longer existed, and that they were not willing to form a permanent concordat with a party at whose head was Sir Allan MacNab. Colonel Taché took Mr. Ross's place, and Mr. J. C. Morrison, through the influence of Mr. Macdonald, was admitted into the cabinet. At a later day the enemy would say the sweet tongued siren lured Mr. Morrison thither. It was hoped that this accession would restore the equilibrium between the reform and conservative elements of the ministry. The step was endorsed by Mr. Morrison's constituents in Niagara, but was regarded by no small portion of his party for years afterwards as a betrayal of trust. The accession, however, added little strength to the cabinet. It had no effect indeed save to discredit the new councillor before his party, and to satisfy a friendship.

Some days later, Mr. John Sandfield Macdonald, who when a storm was to be raised, was always ready to take the part of Ariel, brought in a motion respecting the seat of government, and providing for the abolition of the perambulating system.

“Out of evil Providence sometimes brings good,” attorney-general Macdonald said when “John Sandfield” brought in his motion. Quebec was then chosen as the permanent capital, and the house was asked to grant a sum of £50,000 to erect legislative buildings there. To this latter proposal George Brown and his grits offered fierce opposition, but the amendments they offered were declared out of order by the chair. “Make a direct non-confidence vote” said attorney-general Macdonald, “if you are debarred by the rules of the house from getting the sense of parliament.” He would be a superficial man who supposed that a fit of generosity to Brown and his followers dictated this advice. The suggestion was adopted, Mr. Holton moving that the course of the ministry on the seat of government and other important questions disappointed the expectations of a majority of the people. The motion was defeated by a vote of seventy to forty-seven; but an analysis showed thirty-three Upper Canada members to be among the minority, and only twenty-seven with the majority. For the first time the “double majority” principle was now adopted. It was contended that on a question affecting each division so distinctly as did this, the Upper Canada section of the ministry would be faithless to their trust did they retain office while supported only by a minority of members from their own part of the province. So the Upper Canada division of the government, despite the protestations of Sir Allan, who was “tortured at every joint,” decided to resign. It now seemed as if Providence were about to bring good to the government out of the evil. While the albatross hung about the neck of the Ancient Mariner, there was naught but woe for the unfortunate man, but when the disastrous bird dropped off the curse departed. Sir Allan had long been the albatross about the government’s neck, and “worked ’em woe,” but on the 21st of May he informed the governor-general from the midst of his flannels, that while “not recognising a sectional majority as a sufficient reason for a change of government,” no alternative but resignation was open to himself and his colleagues from Upper Canada. Thus the albatross, dropped off, and the government was saved. A daring way to seek riddance of an incubus; but the man who planned it saw his course far before him, and was not mistaken. Men are sometimes masters of their fate Cassius tells Brutus, and Mr. Macdonald had steadily climbed the ladder, never failing in his purpose, till, at last, we find him upon the round whither he had aspired. We do not believe the superstitious dame who tells us that this one who has attained fame and that one fortune are "lucky;" the fault is never with our stars but with ourselves that we do not succeed; and that "chance," through which they tell us some gain glory and others power, is not chance at all, but "direction which we cannot see." The governor-general called upon colonel Taché, president of the legislative council, he being the senior member of the government, to lead the ministry, but Mr. Macdonald took the reins in the assembly and was virtually the ruling spirit in every department. Mr. Drummond, attorney-general-east, the gentleman whom Mr. Mackenzie brings in judgment against Macdonald, had ambition to lead in the assembly and pressed his claims with much persistency; but the cabinet was not likely to turn from indiscreet impetuosity to respectable mediocrity, and therefore did not entertain Mr. Drummond's proposals at all. "Well, then, I shall not sit in the cabinet," he said. "And you may go," they replied. He did go, believing that the fabric would fall when such a pillar as he had withdrawn its support. Mr. Cartier, the late provincial secretary, became attorney-general-east in the place of Mr. Drummond; Mr. Philip Vankoughnet, one of the most thriving lawyers at the bar, and a close personal friend of Mr. John A. Macdonald's, took Sir Allan MacNab's place as president of the council, and Mr. Timothy Lee Terrill succeeded Mr. Cartier as provincial secretary.

Two days after the resignation Sir Allan was borne into the house, swathed in flannel, by two serving men. The rumour having gone abroad that the knight's ire against Mr. John A. Macdonald was very strong, curiosity was on tip-toe, and members who appreciate "scenes" looked anxiously for the arrival of Mr. Macdonald and his colleagues, in whose absence they did not suppose the explanations proper to the occasion, with the anticipated extra, would be made. But the attorney-general-west and his colleagues judiciously remained away, and Sir Allan, muffled in flannels, and seated in his invalid chair, addressed the house. As his colleagues had chosen to absent themselves, he did not deem it proper to make the explanations he had to offer. The state of his health, he said, had prevented him from discharging his duty as he would wish, during the session. "I have been a member of this house" he went on, "twenty-six years, and during all that period I have not been so long absent as during this session. I think the people of this country will receive that from a man of my age as sufficient excuse." He would be ready, he assured the house to meet the ministers on the following Monday to make certain becoming statements, and he would appeal to the people for a verdict on the course he had taken. "If I am supported by their voice," he added with much emotion, "I shall feel that I am right. If condemned, I am ready to retire into private life,—and perhaps I am now fit for little else." There is something touching in the spectacle of an old man bowed with time and pain, telling those gathered around him, some full of high hopes as he once had been, that the autumn of his days has come, and that he looks now to the falling of the leaf. At such a moment with the grave dimly seen in the background, we can afford to drop the party questions that divide us during our brief sojourn upon the mortal stage and moralize on the instability of human things. There was many a moist eye as this old man, who, with all his defects of character, was frank and generous to a fault, told the assembled members that he had been thrown aside—let us add in the murderous struggle for the survival of the fittest—by younger men, and, that, perhaps, he was no longer useful and only fit to die. It is not, however, that we believe a catastrophe had come upon Sir Allan which was not meet and just; indeed we can allow our tears to flow as Macbeth, the fiend and victim of a morbid ambition, paces the stage and we hear him wail, "I have lived long enough my way of life has fallen into the sear and yellow leaf." There was genuine sorrow as Sir Allan bade a long farewell to the men among whom for so many years he had been a prominent figure. But turning aside from the humanity that bids us weep when the tree in the fulness of time falls, and the petal drops that is never to bloom again, we find ourselves in a world where tears and sentiment will not satisfy the demands of duty; where the fittest survives, and justly so, and the incompetent gives way to the capable.

One of the most important acts of the session was the measure respecting the legislative council. It was provided that councillors already appointed should hold their seats for life (it is probable their positions were regarded as vested rights, though should a merchant or a railway "boss" believe his staff too large he would not allow scruples about "vested rights" to trouble his conscience when discharging such assistance as he did not need); but that every future member should be elected by the people, and for a term of eight years. The province, for the purposes of the act, was divided into forty-eight electoral divisions; and the elections were to be held biennially, twelve members to be chosen at each contest.

Two months before a joyful thrill had run through the civilized world as it was learnt that a treaty of peace had been signed at Paris by the powers. With all the fame and victory-trophies of the war, it had an appalling summing up. Not less than twenty thousand Englishmen who went out to meet the enemy, returned no more. About a sixth of these fell in battle or died of their wounds. Cholera and other diseases engendered by a climate against which the British soldier was not proof, rendered a grim return of the rest. England and France thought not of the loss of sixty thousand lives, but rang with the fame of the allied armies. Instances of heroism had been shown by British troops that gave the actors a place beside the heroes in ancient legend whose valour had filled the world with wonder for more than two thousand years. Many a Canadian flushed with pride as he heard of the brilliant and successful daring of our troops at Alma; many a one compared the unflinching bravery of Fenwick Williams at Kars, the noble if fatal courage of the six hundred horsemen who "rode into the valley of death," to the deeds of the Spartan at Thermopylæ, and of Horatius at the Bridge. The treaty of peace was signed on the 30th of March. One of the articles provided as follows: "The Black Sea is neutralized; its waters and its ports, thrown open to the mercantile marine of every nation, are formally and in perpetuity interdicted to the flag of war either of the powers possessing its coast or any other power." There was an exception by which each power reserved the right of maintaining a force of small armed vessels in the Black Sea to do the duty of a maritime police, and protect the coasts. The navigation of the Danube was thrown open, and the rule was confirmed prohibiting ships of war from passing the straits while the Porte was at peace, during which the Sultan undertook to refuse such vessels admission into the Bosphorus or the Dardanelles. Such were among the most important stipulations of the treaty. Some hopeful statesmen believed that the settlement would long endure, and the olive branch flourish perhaps for centuries to come. Lord Aberdeen, who had no heart in the war, predicted that the results would maintain peace in Eastern Europe for "probably twenty-five years." It was not a bad forecast. Just twenty-two years later the clangor of arms was heard there again.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE DOUBLE SHUFFLE.

AS immigration poured into Canada in an ever-increasing stream some public men began to speculate about a time when population would have spread to the limits of Canada, and the pioneer would venture forth into the vast regions held by the Hudson Bay Company. Some began to dream of a day, not far in the future, when a proud nation would be reared between the republic and the Arctic Ocean; but there lay as a bar to the realization of the vision the gigantic monopoly by which a private company held vast stretches of British territory in the great, unknown North-west. Several wise newspapers and public speakers ridiculed the ardour shown about "desolate regions of snow and muskeg, inhabited by the fox and prairie-wolf, a few bands of indians, and a handful of furriers and half-breeds." The territory was said to be a dismal expanse, set apart by providence for wild beasts, composed of sterile wastes, and of such a climate that grain would not grow there; while its summer,—a season afflicted with frosts—was too short to mature even a small potato or a cabbage. The government, however, were fully alive to the importance of getting possession of the company's territory, and to this end, at the suggestion of attorney-general Macdonald, negotiations were opened with the British government and the company; and chief justice Draper went to England to represent the interests of Canada.

The house met in February. George Brown and his grits were drawn up in line, refusing to be comforted by any manner of legislation emanating from the ministerial mind. In this state of feeling, hostility may be predicated of them to all measures whatsoever not originating on their side of the house, and we need not retail special incidents. One question, however, had grown up of late, a not engrossing question it is true when first discussed, yet like the little cloud, that, in the beginning appears upon the horizon, in regulation size, but which gradually spreads across the heavens, breaking in storm and wracking thunders. This question had now suffused the public mind and promised a harvest of trouble in the near future to the ministry. Representation by Population was the cry thus agitating the popular breast. It was debated on the hustings, and discussed with much warmth and bitterness through the press. On the 27th of April, George Brown, who revelled in public tumult as the petrel does in the storm, arose at his desk holding a piece of paper in his hands from which he read the following motion: "That, in the opinion of this house, the representation of the people in parliament should be based on population without regard to a separating line between Upper and Lower Canada."

The motion after a hot debate was lost, but the opinion expressed during the discussion taught that the time was drawing near when such a concession could not be refused. Mr. Brown warmly advocated the measure in his newspaper as well as in the house, though he was not the originator of the question, and his impetuosity now was due rather to a desire to embarrass the government than to a belief that the country had yet suffered anything from the state of its representation. Had he been a member of the coalition, as he aimed to be, or had hitherto given it support, we may be sure he would have been able to maintain silence about "Rep. by Pop." as he was about the clergy reserves till his own interests and those of the government diverged. This, perhaps, is as proper a place as anywhere else to say that the province was no more indebted, if it was as much, to Mr. Brown for a secularization of the reserves, than to any one of a number of his contemporaries. He continued his alliance with a government which he knew was not disposed to settle the question when the time was ripe for its settlement; when that government reconstructed, and ignored him, he went to the hustings declaring that above all things he wanted secularization, and would form any alliance, or support any candidate, to effect that object; but when the election was done, because his overtures for alliance were rejected, he thwarted in every possible way the administration which accomplished the legislation for which he had been crying out, a ministry which at a bound placed itself abreast of public opinion.

The government saw the danger to its own existence in entertaining Brown's latest proposition, but attorney-general Macdonald did not hesitate to inform Col. Taché that the time was fast coming when it would be the duty of his Upper Canadian colleagues to take up the question of representation. Mr. Macdonald did not believe the interests of the province thus far had suffered anything, or was likely for some time to be prejudiced by maintaining the representation scale fixed by the union; but he was resolved when "the time was ripe"—an expression he was fond of using—to grapple with the question let his party stand or fall. This waiting for the time to ripen the ready critic may deem a vulnerable spot, but it can only be so on the assumption that it is the duty of the statesman to lead public sentiment, instead of to give expression to it in legislation. A fatal mistake surely. We do not send the statesman to the cabinet to do his will, but to do ours: we do not depend upon his talent to devise out of his own consciousness legislation which has not appeared to us as needful; but to give the right and effectual form to that which we regard as for the general good. Nor do we believe it to be the function of the newspaper to mould, or to lead, public opinion. There seems to us to be no special need for thinking machinery in a man if the "we" in the editorial column, which may represent a needy law-student or a feather-headed Bohemian, is to think for him on every subject from killing potato-bugs to voting on the National Policy. With the spread of the habit of independent thinking, and the ceaseless activity of the printing press, bringing from the four winds of heaven knowledge of the revelations and products of every day, the reign of dogma has passed. In the middle ages, when a small tallow candle had to shed light for tens of thousands, when the priest thought for the flock on all important matters, cleric and lay, just as one man now grinds grain for another—at such a time as this, we say, when the mind and conscience of the benighted being were always in the pocket of some one else, the dictum of the editorial column would have been a beneficent aid to the race. Now, however, the little editor who became a censor of human action and intelligence because he failed as a schoolmaster or a veterinary surgeon, is seen endeavouring to coerce the public with a lead pencil: every day engaged in the experiment of leading the high-spirited horse to the well—seldom inducing him to drink. If the statesman have his duty, so we believe has the journalist. That duty is to give the public facts, not to give them inferences; to keep a record of the births of busy time, not to fill his pages with distortions. Give the people the facts; trust to their having sufficient ability to come to proper conclusions. If the Hon. Edward Blake gave forty dollars to the Muskoka sufferers, and David Mills gave them thirty dollars, depend upon the public concluding that the joint donation reached just seventy dollars. There is no use in the tory editor saying that the “miserable contribution of the two reached a trifle over $20.” Give the public the rein, and have no misgivings. If they have an upset they are entitled to it.

The upper house having thrown out the item providing for the erection of legislative buildings, the question was again in the status quo and attorney-general Macdonald suggested to his colleagues a reference of the matter to the Queen for arbitration. The clear grits raised a howl against submitting “a question of purely local concern to the decision of her majesty," and contended that such an act "outraged the spirit of responsible government." Mr. Brown and his grits evidently knew little of propriety or precedents. We believe the custom of submitting questions, great or small, to disinterested parties for arbitration still survives, and that notable cases are on record, such, for example, as the reference of the dispute about the New Brunswick boundary to the king of the Netherlands.

The ministry was now, as ministries always are and always will be, held responsible for the reaction in trade caused by lavish expenditure during the period of unwholesome business activity attending the war, and the failure of the crops throughout the country. Some of the ministers began to grow uneasy, but the hand of Macdonald was at the helm, though Mr. Taché was the nominal commander, and he steered the ship steadily through the reefs. Late in the autumn of 1857 Mr. Terril resigned to give his attention to private affairs, and his place was filled by M. Jacques Loranger. On the 25th of November Col. Taché, who had grown tired of the worries of state-craft, also resigned, and the governor-general at once applied to attorney-general Macdonald to form a government. At last he found himself on "fortune's crowning slope," invested with the semblance as well as the substance of power. The Upper Canada members resumed their places; Mr. George Etienne Cartier took the leadership of the Lower Canada section, still retaining the portfolio of attorney-general-east. On the day following Col. Taché's resignation, the Macdonald-Cartier government took the reins. Two days later parliament was dissolved, and the parties went to the hustings, the clear grits with two shibboleths, "Non-sectarian Schools," and "Representation by Population." The ministry took ground that these questions were not then expedient, and as a result lost in the contest Messrs. Cayley, Spence and Morrison. But the Lower Canada electors who regarded George Brown as an enemy to their race, institutions and religion—and it is difficult to see how they could have regarded him in any other light—and who were opposed to non-sectarian schools, and somewhat to representation by population, though not so zealously as some of our historians state, returned an overwhelming body of ministerialists.

Among the new members elected to parliament, the most conspicuous were Thomas D'Arcy McGee, Hector Louis Langevin, John Rose, William P. Howland, Oliver Mowat and John Carling. The new parliament assembled in February. The opposition was in a more tumultuous state than ever, and this condition was due to the announcement that, on the recommendation of hon. John A. Macdonald and his colleagues, Ottawa,—which in these later years has been styled by Bystander, "an Arctic lumber village"—was chosen as the capital. In this selection the government had evidently defeated their opponents, though the result was not to be seen for some time to come, and ended a perpetual source of discontent, by the aid of geography. Several amendments to the address were moved by the opposition, by which it was seen, that, while the ministry was supported by a considerable majority of the house, it was in a minority in the Upper Canada section. Mr. Joseph Thibaudeau, member for Portneuf, brought in a motion affirming the principle of double majorities, but it was met by the almost entire force of the ministerialists, who were supported by George Brown, Oliver Mowat and many other grit members. Strange to say among those who supported Thibaudeau's motion was Hector Langevin, the member for Dorchester. We say this is strange in view of the great statesmanship Mr. Langevin has always displayed through the brilliant and masterly career which has ever since been his.

After the ministry had got this troublesome question off its hands, a resolution and several amendments, disapproving of her majesty's choice of Ottawa as a capital, were moved by Messrs. Brown, Thibaudeau, Dunkin, Piché and others. After an animated discussion, Mr. Piché's amendment, setting forth that, "It is the opinion of this house that the city of Ottawa ought not to be the permanent seat of government for the province," was carried by a vote of sixty-four to fifty. Before the word "carried" had left the speaker's lips, George Brown's enthusiasm had passed bounds, and he jumped to his feet. The occasion helps us to get the measure of the man. "The house" he said, as soon as the cheering ceased, "can have no doubt that the motion just carried expressed an emphatic disapproval of the government policy; and in order to prove that it means just this, I now move an adjournment of the house." The premier arose perfectly cool, and informed members that he was glad to accept the challenge of the leader of the opposition. "Let the vote on adjournment" he said, with a slightly ironical tone, "test whether or not the ministry possesses the confidence of the house." Mr. Macdonald knew that while a majority in the assembly was opposed to fixing the seat of government at Ottawa, there was by no means a majority disposed to transfer the reins into the hands of George Brown. When the speaker put the motion to adjourn it was clearly understood that the fate of the ministry hung on the issue. Macdonald was not mistaken. Sixty-one said "nay," and only fifty "yea." An analysis of the vote, however, showed that a large majority of the Upper Canada section voted with the yeas. After the house adjourned Mr. Macdonald conferred with his colleagues on the situation. "Brown," he said, "has been really doing our work; and by his indiscreet motion shows what our duty to ourselves now is." It was then agreed that the government could strike a decisive blow at the opposition by resigning. The motion carried by the grits was equivalent to a censure on her majesty, and the ministry felt that by resigning they would identify themselves with the cause of their sovereign. Mr. Macdonald never believed that Mr. Brown would have a ghost of a chance to form an enduring ministry, though some of his colleagues were timid, and feared that he would soon gather a number of the "loose fish" around him. "My mind is perfectly easy on the point," said Macdonald, "I am absolutely certain that he will not be sustained in the house." Now, one would suppose that Mr. Brown, knowing that a majority was opposed to him, would have hesitated before grasping at glory which could only turn to disaster. The apologists of Mr. Brown tell us that he foresaw his reception in parliament but had faith in the governor granting a dissolution. We believe he expected nothing of the kind. The "higher game" for which he had been so long burning he saw within his grasp, and with the same indiscreet impetuosity with which he allowed himself to call for a test vote after the passage of Piché's resolution, he would now thrust out his hand for the office within his reach. The fact is Mr. Brown was somewhat incapable of forecast or restraint where personal interest and ambition were behind urging him on. But let us see what happened.

The Macdonald-Cartier government resigned, and Sir Edmund Head wrote to George Brown: * * "His excellency feels it right to have recourse to you as the most prominent member of the opposition, and he hereby offers you a seat in the council as the leader of a new administration." Mr. Brown was too jubilant to pause long before replying to this note. "Buy me the captain's commission, mother," said the son in the beleagured city. "The soldiers will be over the wall to-morrow, my son, and your glory will be short-lived." "I don't care mother, I want to be a captain." And George Brown was not concerned that the enemy would to-morrow break over the wall. He did not see that he was in a miserable minority in the house. He wanted to be a prime minister, to grasp the "high game," so he wrote: "Mr. Brown has the honour to inform his excellency that he accepts the duty proposed to him in his excellency's communication, and undertakes the formation of a new ministry." Had Macdonald been by when Brown sealed this letter he must have muttered with Antony:

“ Now let it work ; mischief, thou art afoot, Take thou what course thou wilt.”

On the following day, Sunday, in the afternoon, an aide-de-camp waited on Mr. Brown and delivered to him a memorandum, which the governor-general desired him to submit to his proposed colleagues. This memorandum stated that his excellency gave “no pledge or promise, express or implied, with reference to the dissolving of parliament,” a condition for which Mr. Brown strongly pressed the governor at a previous interview, receiving the same answer. The memorandum went on to show that his excellency was willing to consent to a prorogation with the understanding that parliament should meet again, “say in November or December ;” but an intimation was given that a prorogation would not be granted till “the bill for the registration of voters, and that containing the prohibition of fraudulent assignments and gifts by traders” had become law. “Besides this,” his excellency wrote, “any item of supply absolutely necessary should be provided for by a vote of credit, and the money for the repairs of canals, which cannot be postponed, should be voted. * * If parliament merely adjourns until after the re-election of the members of the government the case is different and the responsibility is on the house itself.” Mr. Brown, as we have seen, had been requested by his excellency to lay the memorandum before his proposed colleagues, but the grit chieftain did nothing of the sort. That was not his way. Being dictator, if he pleased himself, why need he to trouble about the wishes of his colleagues. So with hot haste he despatched a note on Monday morning informing the governor that he had selected the members of his proposed ministry, and that the latter could not be in a position to discuss any measures or questions of public policy with his excellency till they had “assumed the functions of constitutional advisers of the crown.” Partizan writers like Mr. Mackenzie have complained of his excellency’s lack of courtesy and frankness to Mr. Brown, but the discourtesy and lack of frankness, as the extract last made evinces, were begun by Mr. Brown himself. His refusal to discuss certain questions with his excellency at the latter's request, was not alone discourteous, but insulting to the governor-general. It implied that Sir Edmund either did not know the bounds and dignities of his position, or that he was, while putting the latter under foot, trying to entrap the incoming ministry into his confidence for some sinister purpose. Mr. Brown may not have recognized the duty of one gentleman towards another; but history is bound to take notice of the facts. Mr. Mackenzie describes what we deem the discourtesy of Mr. Brown on this occasion in language somewhat different from ours. He calls it a "dignified rebuke to the governor." About half-past ten in the forenoon of the same day, Mr. Brown waited on his excellency, and submitted the names of his colleagues. The latter were sworn in at noon, and were as follows:—

Mr. Patrick rose in the house in the afternoon announcing the names of the new ministers, and likewise stating that he had been instructed to say that it was the wish of the government that parliament should be prorogued at an early day. Explanations as to the policy of the government he hoped to be able to make on the morrow,—but he was indulging in a false hope, if he was not pretending, for the new cabinet was a mass of contrarieties, and there was not the shadow of a possibility that the administration could evolve a policy within a day, or a week, or a month. The house was not pleased that it should have been asked to vote for the new ministry blindfold. A statement of policy in the most general way would have induced it to extend the ordinary courtesies. When Mr. Patrick sat down, Mr. Bureau rose and moved the issue of a writ for the election of a member in Montreal, to replace Mr. Dorion. But on the motion being put, Mr. H. L. Langevin moved the following amendment: “That this house, while ordering the said writ, must, at the same time, state that the administration, the formation of which has created this vacancy, does not possess the confidence of this house and of the country.” This amendment was seconded by Mr. John Beverley Robinson, son of the chief justice of Upper Canada. A fierce debate began and continued till midnight, when the ministry was defeated by a majority of forty votes. Thus was the fairfruit which the reckless premier plucked in the morning, turned to ashes in his hand before the beating of the midnight bell. Mr. Langevin and those who supported his amendment have been accused of violating parliamentary courtesy in condemning a ministry without knowing its policy;—but because it did not disclose its policy was one of the reasons why it was hurled from the eminence upon which it had rashly seated itself. We admit much is due to the customs and courtesies of parliament, but Mr. Brown and his following who had worried and thwarted the government through the session in a manner not quite courteous, deserved everything at the hands of the house that could be done within the letter of the constitution. The vote showed that the assembly was disposed to rebuke Mr. Brown for his conduct no less than for his indiscreet haste in rushing into office when he knew his opponents had a large majority in the house. "But it reveals a trick," say his defenders. "The trap was set for Mr. Brown." We answer, if Mr. Brown, or any other man who sets himself up as the censor and leader of men, cannot keep out of traps, it is a pity that he should not go into them. Mr. Macdonald had the right, with the attendant risks, of resigning, as any prime minister has at any time, for whatever reason to him seems sufficient; but it did not follow that Mr. Brown should sacrifice himself to his own unforeseeing and impetuous ambition. Mr. Macdonald saw he wanted to be in office, and that his ambition had become a dominant power with him. He resigned, and let him go in. The parliament made haste to turn him out again. We presume, without discussing obsolete courtesies, they had the right to do so.

An analysis of the vote showed that the callow ministry had been defeated by a majority of votes in both sections of the province. In the upper house also a no-confidence resolution was introduced by Mr. Paton, and after a hot discussion in which Mr. Vankoughnet and Col. Prince assailed the ministry in very able speeches, the motion was carried by a vote of two to one.

On the following day Mr. Brown waited upon his excellency and urged an immediate prorogation with a view to dissolution. Once again the governor told him, as he had done twice before, that he could not, from his present light upon the subject, give any hopes of a dissolution. It was now the governor's turn to be cautious; and to guard against misrepresentation he requested Mr. Brown to put in writing the grounds upon which he based his request. One can fancy a certain kind of document presented by a newly-fledged county-councillor to the reeve of his municipality, or a protest made to the chair by a spinster at a meeting held to put down the use of tobacco; but this document sent to Sir Edmund Head by Mr. Brown is unique, we venture to say, in constitutional literature. One of its strong reasons for asking a dissolution was this: "The house they [the ministry] believe does not possess the confidence of the country; and the public dissatisfaction has been greatly increased by the numerous and glaring acts of corruption and fraud by which many seats were obtained at the last general election." Not satisfied with this the cabinet gives another reason. As it would be a pity not to reproduce it, here it is: "For some years past strong sectional feelings have arisen in the country, which, especially during the present session, have seriously impeded the carrying on of the administrative and legislative functions of the government. The late administration made no attempt to meet these difficulties or to suggest a remedy for them, and thereby the evil has been greatly aggravated. His excellency's present advisers have entered the government with the fixed determination to propose constitutional measures for the establishment of that harmony between Upper and Lower Canada which is essential to the prosperity of the province. They respectfully submit that they have a right to claim all the support which his excellency can constitutionally extend to them in the prosecution of this all important object." One might have supposed that these two reasons were overwhelming, but the main shot still remained in the locker, an appeal to the pity of the governor. It was as follows: "The unprecedented and unparliamentary course pursued by the house of assembly—which, immediately after having by their vote compelled the late ministry to retire, proceeded to pass a vote of want of confidence in the present administration, without notice, within a few hours of their appointment, in their absence from the house, and before their policy had been announced—affords the most convincing proof that the affairs of the country cannot be efficiently conducted under the control of the house as now constituted." There is more even than absurdity in this; there is inaccuracy. It was not true that the assembly had "by their vote compelled the late ministry to retire." The resignation was voluntary; but we must be frank enough to admit that it was not done out of deference to any principle or to the sense of the majority of the Upper Canada section of the cabinet. It was simply done to lure Mr. Brown into a pitfall; and into the pitfall he went, eyes and mouth wide open.

However, let us see if Sir Edmund's feelings can be wrought upon like the lady-president of the anti-tobacco club. Before touching the grounds on which the dissolution is urged, his excellency, among others, gives the following replies: "His excellency is no doubt bound to deal fairly with all political parties; but he has a duty to perform to the Queen and the people of Canada paramount to that which he owes to any one party, or to all parties whatsoever. The question for his excellency to decide is not, 'what is advantageous or fair for a particular party?' but what upon the whole, is the most advantageous and fair for the people of the province. The resignation of the late government was tendered in consequence of a vote of the house which did not assert directly any want of confidence in them." His excellency then points out that a want of confidence in the government had been emphatically voted by both branches of the legislature, and adds that he is asked to dissolve parliament by a ministry "who possesses the confidence of neither branch of the legislature." We do not pretend to have so subtle a knowledge of constitutional mystery as Mr. Mackenzie, but we have no hesitation in saying that we think the simple fact last stated was, alone, sufficient ground on which to refuse a dissolution. This is how the governor answered the wail made about the legislature voting the want of confidence, an answer all the more effective, because made in reply to a man who boasted of being the advocate of the supremacy of the people through their legislatures, and who had in his memorandum virtually appealed to the governor against the house of parliament. "It is not the duty of the governor-general to decide whether the action of the two houses on Monday night was or was not in accordance with the usual courtesy of parliament towards an incoming administration. The two houses are the judges of the propriety of their own proceedings. His excellency has to do with the conclusions at which they arrive, providing only that the forms observed are such as to give legal and constitutional force to their votes." A striking lecture we repeat from a viceroy to a man who had made so much newspaper thunder against the iniquity of governors thwarting, or meddling with, legislatures. Some of the reasons put forward by Sir Edmund against granting a dissolution are as follows: "An election took place only last winter. This fact is not conclusive against a second election now, but the costs and inconvenience of such a proceeding are so great, that they ought not to be incurred a second time without very strong grounds.

"The business before parliament is not yet finished. It is perhaps true that very little which is absolutely essential for the country remains to be done. A portion, however, of the estimates, and two bills, at least, of great importance, are still before the legislative assembly, irrespective of the private business.

"In addition to this, the resolutions respecting the Hudson Bay territory have not been considered, and no answer on that subject can be given to the British government.

"The time of year and state of affairs would make a general election at this moment peculiarly inconvenient and burthensome, inasmuch as the harvest is now going on in a large portion of the country, and the pressure of the late money crisis has not passed away."

These, however, were reasons outside of those in answer to Brown's memorandum. The governor's reply to the points in the ministerial paper are worth reproducing. We consider them overwhelming; but Mr. Mackenzie says they were only "carping criticism."

"The following considerations are strongly pressed by his excellency's present advisers as reasons why he should authorize an appeal to the people, and thereby retain their services in the council.

“(1.) The corruption and bribery alleged to have been practised at the last election, and the taint which on that account is said to attach to the present legislative assembly.

“(2.) The existence of a bitter sectional feeling between Upper and Lower Canada, and the ultimate danger to the union as at present constituted, which is likely to arise from such feeling.

“If the first of these points be assumed as true, it must be asked what assurance can his excellency have that a new election, under precisely the same laws, held within six or eight months of the last, will differ in its character from that which then took place? If the facts are as they are stated to be, they might be urged as a reason why a general election should be avoided as long as possible; at any rate until the laws are made more stringent, and the precautions against such evils shall have been increased by the wisdom of parliament. Until this is done, the speedy recurrence of the opportunity of practising such abuses would be likely to aggravate their character, and confirm the habit of resorting to them.

“The second consideration, as to the feeling between Upper and Lower Canada, and the ultimate danger of such feelings to the union, is one of a very grave kind. It would furnish to his excellency the strongest possible motive for a dissolution of parliament, and for the retention of the present government at all hazards, if the two points were only conclusively established, that is to say, if it could be shown that the measures likely to be adopted by Mr. Brown and his colleagues were a specific, and the only specific for these evils, and that the members of the present council were the only men to allay the jealousies so unhappily existing. It may be that both these propositions are true, but, unless they are established to his excellency's complete satisfaction, the mere existence of the mischief is not in itself decisive as to the propriety of resorting to a general election at the present moment. The certainty, or at any rate the great probability, of the cure by the course proposed, and by that alone, would require to be also proved. Without this, a great present evil would be voluntarily incurred for the chance of a remote good." In conclusion, his excellency declined to grant a dissolution.

We need not refer to the plea recapitulated under "(1.," as the governor thoroughly illustrates its absurdity; but the contention of "(2.," in which dissolution is urged on the ground that "bitter sectional feeling exists between Upper and Lower Canada," and that George Brown should be given an opportunity to establish peace and unity there, can scarcely be regarded in a serious light, when we remember that the breach between the two sections was in a great measure the work of Brown himself, and that his great aim through his newspaper and in the legislature seemed to be to create discord between the French and English. And as proof of how strong a sense of his nefarious course rankled in the minds of the French Canadian members, on the non-confidence resolution he received but four Lower Canada votes. There was now only one course open to Mr. Brown. He resigned.

Those who understand the purpose and drift of Mr. Mackenzie's book need not be told that the character of Sir Edmund Head, in its pages, appears as black as ink and partisanship can make it. Mr. Mackenzie's style is usually clear and incisive—it now and again suggests the filing of a saw—yet it is hard in the pages he devotes to this question to ascertain what he means, other than to say unpleasant things of Sir Edmund and to cover his idol with glory—perhaps we ought to say with rose-water. Where page after page bristles with this tile-cutting censure of the governor, the reader who does not presuppose malice naturally looks for a plain statement of some scandalous and unconstitutional act of the viceroy. But he will find no such thing. The honour of a chief justice, who in private life could no more stoop to the baseness with which he is charged, than a partisan could say a generous word for an opponent, or do him justice, is aspersed; while the conduct of the governor, upon the testimony of irresponsible rumor and clever surmises, is pictured to be that of a conspirator, and his whole character sought to be covered with obloquy. But we must rule out of court Mr. Mackenzie's unsupported opinion and address ourselves to the facts. The governor, he says—and this is one of his strongest grounds—"was bound as a ruler and as an honest man to see that no impediment should be thrown in the way of his new advisers getting fair play in submitting their policy to the country through the medium of a new election." The "impediment," which we have italicized, meant the non-confidence vote passed by the house. But what would Mr. Mackenzie have the governor do about this vote? He tells us it was his excellency's duty "to see that no impediment" should be thrown in the way. Would he have the governor go down like the tyrant Charles, to muzzle the legislature? If the language does not mean this, it means nothing. His other point, and these are the only two he offers, outside of the slanders he scatters through his pages, is that the governor should have granted a dissolution to Brown because he had given the latter "to understand, as plainly as if he had said it in so many words, that whatever he (Mr. Brown) found it necessary to do he should have his support." We suppose the reader is now able to judge of Mr. Mackenzie's tactics. He deliberately ignores the interview held before Brown formed his government, in which the latter was informed by his excellency that he was not to count on a dissolution; and the distinct statement in the memorandum, before the ministry was sworn in, or the governor had any knowledge of Brown's choice, that "the governor-general gives no pledge or promise express or implied, with reference to dissolving parliament;" and charges Sir Edmund with having deceived Mr. Brown. He shuts his ears to the governor's distinct and repeated words and elicits a contrary language from his actions. Mr. Brown, however, understood the governor's language plainly enough, but too elated with the offer of office "rushed to glory" reckless of consequences. As a party driver he may have depended on his power of over-awing the governor, though we cannot give him the credit of such forecast. He fared little better than the excited son in the beleaguered city, who wanted to be a captain. He wore the honours for four days, and then was out of office, and out of parliament. As to the governor's conduct throughout the affair, no impartial man will say that it was not beyond reproach, while we cannot doubt with Bystander, that "hatred of what might be deemed incendiarism, and a sense of the peril which it was bringing on the country, may very likely have prejudiced Sir Edmund against Mr. Brown," though this would not, and did not, influence the act of his excellency.

The governor-general next applied to Mr. Galt, a member of marked abilities and high parliamentary standing, but that gentleman had occupied solitary ground, allying himself to neither party, and was without a following. He declined the governor's proposal,—something that George Brown would not have done—and recommended to his excellency Mr. George E. Cartier the late leader of the Lower Canada section of the cabinet. Sir Edmund took the advice, and called Mr. Cartier, who promptly undertook the task of forming a new ministry. The incoming administration was the same as the Macdonald-Cartier government, the only exception being that Messrs. Cayley and Loranger were left out and Messrs. Galt and Sherwood taken in their places. The Cartier-Macdonald ministry resumed office eight days after the resignation of the Macdonald-Cartier government. Though Mr. Macdonald had changed places, and, as some who did not like the transposition at the time phrased it, "the car had been put before the horse," Macdonald's was the ruling spirit in the cabinet, although Mr. Cartier was one of the ablest men in Canada. Now during the session of 1857, an act relating to the independence of parliament had been passed, and the seventh section provided that, "whenever any person holding the office of receiver-general, inspector-general, secretary of the province, commissioner of crown lands, attorney-general, solicitor-general, commissioner of public works, speaker of the legislative council, president of committees of the executive council, minister of agriculture or postmaster-general, and being at the same time a member of the legislative assembly, or an elected member of the legislative council, shall resign his office, and within one month after his resignation accept any other of the said offices, he shall not thereby vacate his seat in the said assembly or council." A meeting of proposed ministers was held after the personnel of the cabinet had been decided upon, and it was then mooted, that, under the section just quoted, the incoming ministers, by complying with certain legal formalities, need not go back to their constituencies for re-election, but simply take their seats. The technicality of the law was complied with by M. Cartier, on the 6th instant, becoming inspector-general; Mr. Macdonald, postmaster-general; Mr. Alleyn, provincial-secretary; Mr. Sicotte, commissioner of public works; Mr. Rose, receiver-general; Mr. Sidney Smith, president of the council and minister of agriculture. On the following day another change was made and the new cabinet stood as follows:—

FOR CANADA WEST.

HON. JOHN A. MACDONALD	- - - -	Attorney-General.
" P. M. VANKOUGHNET	- - - -	Com. Crown Lands.
" JOHN ROSS	- - - -	President of the Council.
" SIDNEY SMITH	- - - -	Postmaster-General.
" GEORGE SHERWOOD	- - - -	Receiver-General.

HON. GEORGE E. CARTIER	- - - -	Premier and Attorney General.
" A. T. GALT	- - - -	Inspector-General
" L. V. SICOTTE	- - - -	Minister Public Works.
" N. F. BELLEAU	- - - -	Speaker Legislative Council.
" CHARLES ALLEYN	- - - -	Provincial Secretary.

Thus it will be seen that the new ministry evaded the responsibility of going back for election by accepting within a month other offices than those held at the time of resignation. This was the expedient that has been since known as the "double shuffle." The laws of the land with their technicalities, are for cabinet ministers we presume, as well as for shabby clients in inferior courts; and we are unable to see why a plea which would be respected and irresistible in a court of justice should be regarded as a disgraceful trick in a council chamber. Once more, technicalities may be the excrescences of law, but if the writer of "The Last Forty Years" sued his friend to recover a loaned pair of boots and won the same on a technicality, would he have the moral generosity to say to the defendant, "Here are the boots; I recovered them by the mere letter of the law, and not according to its spirit." We do not believe he would. But he is shocked as he writes about ministers retaining their seats by virtue of a technicality, and, after due condemnation, utters a sigh, and "dismisses the subject from his pages." If we are not mistaken two cases, almost similar to this, occurred not so very long ago in England. In 1839 Lord Melbourne introduced his Jamaica Bill, but being only able to carry it with a majority of five, resigned. The Queen at once sent for Peel, the leader of the refurbished tory party, and invited him to form a ministry; but as every one remembers the "question of the petticoats" stood in his way—he could not rule with Lady Normanby—and he had to fall back into private membership. Her Majesty at the advice of Lord John Russell called on Melbourne again, who, with the rest of the cabinet, resumed their offices, without, if we remember aright, appealing to the people. Another case in point happened in 1873 when the liberal government suddenly found themselves defeated on their Irish University Bill. Mr. Gladstone resigned, and, by his advice, the Queen invited Mr. Disraeli to form a ministry. Mr. Disraeli, who did not resemble George Brown, thought the situation over, and concluded not to try his luck in the commons as constituted; whereupon Her Majesty again sent for Mr. Gladstone, who, with the other ministers, quietly resumed their places. There was no election, if we are not mistaken, in this case either; yet there is nothing on record in England about single or double shuffles. The case here differed somewhat, but not so as to change the constitutional principle involved in the English cases. There was a slight legal barrier in the way in Canada, and it was avoided by taking advantage of the letter of the law. But we have to repeat that the client who would, in one of our courts, take advantage of a technicality to gain his suit, is ineligible to cast a stone at the actors in the double shuffle, unless it be assumed that politicians have more honour, or ought to have, than other men; a contention which we deny.

The new government was supported by a good majority, and during the session passed a number of important measures. Since a quietus had been given to the question of double majorities, a desire for representation by population had taken deep root in Upper Canada. The question of "Protection to Home Industries," as a direct issue, came up for the first time during the session of 1858, being introduced by Mr. Cayley, though, as we have already seen, it had been discussed before in connection with certain tariff changes. During this year science accomplished one of its wonders, in connecting Europe and America by the Atlantic cable. During the year, likewise, the 100th regiment was organized, and that highminded politician of stainless name, Robert Baldwin, passed to his rest.

CHAPTER XIV.

TRANSITION.

WHILE Canada was struggling for responsible government, reformers were engaged in a similar conflict in the maritime provinces. There, it is true, the question of races, which lay at the bottom of most of the tumult in Canada, did not exist; but both in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the will of the people was threatened by the domination of a Family Compact. The chief cause of discontent in New Brunswick was the control of crown lands and timber by a commissioner responsible only to the imperial government. This official received a handsome salary, sold the lands according to his caprice, retained fees and perquisites, and defied the house of assembly. During the session of 1832 the latter body presented an address to the governor praying that he would cause to be laid before the house, annually, a detailed statement of the receipts of the crown lands department. In their zeal for the welfare of the province the members went too far, however; for the governor haughtily refused to grant the demand, and left the impression that both himself and the executive, especially the commissioner of crown lands, regarded the request as an insult. Messrs. Charles Simonds and E. B. Chandler were then deputed to go to England and press upon the colonial secretary the necessity and justice of handing over the crown lands to the control of the legislature. As a result of the mission, Lord Stanley, the following year, proposed terms which satisfied the assembly but there was a hidden hand at work, and the irresponsible commissioner went on selling lands at choice terms to friends and wealthy speculators, without making the desired return of receipts. In 1836 the blood of the house of assembly again began to rise. An address was presented once more asking for detailed accounts of the sales of crown lands and timber, but the governor presented a mere general statement, again baffling enquiry. An address to the king was then passed praying for redress, and Messrs. Crane and L. A. Wilmot were deputed to lay it at the foot of the throne. King William approved of the prayer, and the outcome was that the net amount of casual and territorial revenue was placed at the disposal of the assembly, the latter undertaking to provide a permanent civil list of £14,500, annually, for the payment of public officials. The decision of the home government went sorely against the grain of the governor, Sir Archibald Campbell, and he despatched Hon. George F. Street to the colonial office to endeavour to "undo the mischief." The fact is the governor was sincere in believing that public moneys should not be trusted to legislatures for expenditure; that they were only safe in the hands of some man like the commissioner who was beyond popular control. The governor was a soldier, and his whole being was pervaded by the military instinct. He regarded the people much as he looked upon the troops under his command. The duty of the commander was to give orders; that of the soldier to obey. What could the troops know of expenditure, and the order or economies of campaigns. What did the people or their house of assembly know of how government should be administered or public moneys expended. The truth is Sir Archibald was like some extinct animal restored, which had broken loose and wandered out of past ages down into a time when a higher order of creatures moved upon the planet—when the dawn-light of liberty had burst upon the world in all its virgin freshness.

In the summer of 1848, as we have seen, toryism made its last appeal to Canada, and then fell never again to raise its head. Its fall was not without an influence on other provinces than Canada. Lord Falkland, the governor of Nova Scotia found a coalition on his arrival in that province in 1840, similar to that established the following year in Canada under the union; but as his term of office advanced he learned from Metcalfe, the Canadian scourge, the plan of making appointments, and committing the government to certain acts of policy, without the consent of the reform members of his cabinet. The result was that Joseph Howe, the chief reformer of the administration, and his liberal colleagues, resigned, as Messrs. Baldwin and Lafontaine had done in Canada. After Falkland had succeeded in distracting the province, and several witty, if not scurrilous, reformers had loaded him with abuse and ridicule in prose and rhyme, he was recalled, and Sir John Harvey, the "political pacificator," removed from Newfoundland, and appointed in his place. The new governor at once tried to construct a ministry out of the timber of both parties, but Howe was sick of coalitions, and said that as it was now the eve of a general election he would wait for "a better proposition than that." The election came in 1848. As Howe had foreseen, the Compact were routed, to use the newspaper phrase of the time, "horse, foot and artillery." They laid down their arms, and Howe's patience, if not patriotism, was rewarded by being called on to form an administration. In the same year the question of responsible government was put to a test in New Brunswick. Mr. Charles Fisher, the member for York, framed a resolution affirming that the terms of Earl Grey's despatch of 1847 were as applicable to New Brunswick as to Nova Scotia. The most important point laid down in this despatch was that no ministry could hold its place unless it commanded a majority of the house of assembly. The resolution was debated with much fervour, and when the ministry saw that it was certain to be carried, like Richard, they turned suddenly around and joined the insurgents. The surprise at this change of attitude was not greater, however, than that occasioned by the entry into the tory cabinet, a few days later, of Charles Fisher and Lemuel Wilmot. Had these two gentlemen possessed the patience, or the patriotism, of Joseph Howe, they might have reaped the same rewards with a full measure of honour at no distant day, as the province was prepared, when the opportunity came, to cast aside the remnant of what had been so long a galling yoke. But Fisher and Wilmot were both weak and vain men. The lure of office, even under circumstances that compromised their political honour, was more than they could resist. The next question of importance that stirred the maritime provinces was the scheme of confederation.

During the session of the Canadian parliament which met early in 1859, the decision of her majesty in selecting Ottawa as the capital, or rather the compromise, of Upper and Lower Canada, was brought before the house, and ratified after a stormy debate by a majority of five. One of the most important measures of the session was the adoption of a "national policy." Mr. Galt, the inspector-general, introduced the resolution, the most important feature of which was an increase of from fifteen to twenty per cent. on non-enumerated imports. The duty was so laid on as to give protection to certain classes of Canadian manufactures, and the author of the measure was Mr. Isaac Buchanan, of Hamilton, who had given life-long attention to trade questions, and believed that it lay in the power of legislatures to make or mar commerce. In this same session the term inspector-general was abolished, and "Finance Minister," which, under our budding nationality, has become such an important name, adopted in its stead. The first minister of finance in this country, the reader will hardly wonder at being told, was Mr. (now Sir) Alexander Tilloch Galt. The most important measure the session brought forth was the address which both houses passed, praying that her majesty, accompanied by the prince consort, and such other members of her royal household as she might select would graciously "deign to be present at the opening," in the following year, of the Victoria Bridge across the St. Lawrence river at Montreal. Bridge-building was not so common in Canada then as it is now, or the house would not have thought of routing out the whole royal family to come over here on the occasion in question. They sent the speaker of the assembly, Mr. Henry Smith, over with the address and to receive her majesty's reply. We may as well state here the result. Her majesty could not leave the seat of empire, much as it would have pleased her to be present at the opening of a bridge in Canada, but she generously resolved* to send her son, Albert Edward, then in his nineteenth year, and up to this time having a good character—so far as the public knew—to be present at the event. It is true it was a sacrifice, greater than any reader of this book can imagine, for the prince to undertake a journey out to this rough country, but so great was the regard for the welfare of the colonies that he shut his eyes to the hardships and came. We shall tell in a paragraph in its proper place all that it is necessary for the reader to know about the visit. After the close of the session, which took place in May, the offices of government, after a strong protest against the expense, by a number of Upper Canada members, were removed to Quebec, where they remained till they were finally established at Ottawa, six years later.

During the summer following prorogation the feeling rapidly grew in Upper Canada, that, since the abandonment of the double-majority principle, representation by population could alone save the upper province, now making rapid strides forward in progress and spread of population, from French domination. During the late autumn a monster reform convention composed of delegates from all parts of the upper province, was held in Toronto to "consider the relations between Upper and Lower Canada, and the financial and political evils that had resulted therefrom, and to devise constitutional changes fitted to remedy the said abuses and to secure good government for the province." A number of speeches aflame with denunciation of the government were made, and before the gathering dispersed a "constitutional reform association" was organized to press forward a scheme for a repeal of the union, and the establishment of two or more local governments, with a joint authority having control of matters common to both sections of the province. A scheme for a confederation of all the British North American colonies was proposed at the conference, but the general opinion was that such a measure was so beset with difficulties that it could not be accomplished within several years, if at all, and, that, meanwhile, crying evils in Upper Canada demanded an immediate remedy. Some minor reformers sniffed upon the breeze a faint taint of treason, and opposed the resolutions of the convention; while John Sandfield Macdonald withdrew, expressing his decided disapproval of any measures that aimed to make inroads upon the constitution. In Montreal Messrs. Drummond, McGee, Dorion, and others set on foot a similar movement, but the ardour of the scheme was damped by the undying feeling of hostility which existed towards George Brown, who was the hustler of the movement in the upper province.

* Rev. Charles Pedley, who wrote a "History of Newfoundland," dwells rapturously on the "sentiment of reverent and grateful loyalty," shown by the colonists "towards the royal lady who had entrusted her son to the hospitality of the distant subjects of her realm" (p. 448). The same excellent historian regards the visit of the prince to St. John's, N. F., as an occurrence of greater moment than the laying of the Atlantic cable, which had been accomplished two years before the date of the royal visitation.

An event of the new year, and one fruitful of evil and annoyance to the government, was the appointment of Mr. Joseph Curran Morrison to the office of solicitor-general-west, which position he retained from February, 1860, to March, 1862, though in the meantime he had no seat in either branch of the legislature. There were men at the time, having the parliamentary qualifications, equally as capable to fill the office as Mr. Morrison, but the personal friendship of Mr. John A. Macdonald overcame all obstacles, and the censure of the opposition press. We cannot but admire the man who for the sake of satisfying friendship would brave obloquy, and challenge serious dangers ; but we have not much admiration for the man who would accept favours at such a risk to a chivalrous friend. If Macdonald owed a duty to friendship, so too did Morrison; and the duty of the latter was not to enter the cabinet, or, having entered it, to have resigned when the enemy began to sound a censure upon their trumpets.

The next session opened at Quebec, in February. The "abundant harvest," such as was the custom in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, was touched upon, and in such a manner that the allusion, like at this day in the documents planned by Mr. Mowat, and by the subject of this biography, read like an insinuation, that, while providence was to be thanked for the said bountiful harvest, the ministry was also entitled to a share of the credit. The government was sustained by majorities obtained from the Lower Canada members, and the enemy declared that Macdonald was bound neck and heel to the French. No one in the house more deprecated the necessity of resorting to French-Canadian majorities on all questions which touched the existence of the government than the attorney-general-west, but he believed that a change was coming. The tyranny of George Brown was so galling, that all the members of the grit party who had any spirit were looking for other leadership. Several liberals of standing refused any longer to follow Brown's lead ; others became disgusted and grew lukewarm about the fate of parties. One day while major Thomas Campbell, the member for Rouville, and a liberal of high standing and much ability, was making a speech, he called upon George Brown to "relinquish the leadership of a party with which French-Canadians could never unite so long as he was at its head." The friendship of George Brown had proven to many Lower Canada members what the upas is to him who rests in its shade. Yet it was George Brown, if our readers remember, who put forward as one of his strong grounds for urging a dissolution upon Sir Edmund Head, that discord existed between the English and French, and that his government had a specific to heal the sores. But although Mr. Brown saw that his followers were dropping off and looking for another leader, he bent himself vigorously to work. He prepared and moved two resolutions, setting forth that the union was a failure, and that the true remedy lay in the establishment of two or more governments having jurisdiction over local affairs, and a supreme joint authority, "charged with such matters as are necessarily common to both sections of the province." Resolutions were introduced with the ablest speeches, it is said, that Mr. Brown ever delivered, but were defeated, one, by a vote of 66 to 27, and the other by 74 to 32.

As this was a black-letter year in Canadian annals, the famous 1860, during which a prince of the reigning house, and the heir apparent to the British throne and dominions, was to visit Canada, the legislature prorogued in May, with the understanding that it was to meet again in the summer to give a suitable welcome to the royal visitor. When the chariot of Zeus was seen in the clouds by the armies hurling their might against Troy, a flutter went through warriors who showed no emotion before the ruinous spear of the foe; for now a "god was coming." Harsh thunder, too, grated across the heavens, and the hills shivered at the approach of this great deity. When it was known that the prince of Wales was actually afloat in the Hero bound for Canada, the hearts of colonists began to bound, and a feeling of awe came over them like that which passed through the serried ranks of the Greeks, when Jupiter's wheels were seen in the thunder-smoke. Some of our people could not convince themselves that the visit was a reality and not a myth. Was it possible, they mentally asked, that the prince, in actual flesh and blood, the heir of a kingdom, was actually to be in our cities, to put his foot on our streets, to eat our bread and drink our milk, like an ordinary human being. To do justice to the Greeks, they had an excuse for their perturbation, for he who filled them with awe was not some frail, earthly creature like themselves, whose corpse would one day make a banquet for the worms, but a god disencumbered of flesh, and framed of spirit and ether, who held the winds and the lightnings in his hands, and who in battle plucked up the hills by their wooded crowns and hurled them at the foe. There was no similarity in 1860 between Zeus and Albert Edward, nor has any appeared since—unless it be in their morals. In July the Hero, bearing the prince and his suite, and followed by a fleet of war vessels, arrived off those grim cliffs of Newfoundland, that rise like cold, haughty Titans out of the never-resting sea. The cormorant, and the guillemot, and the ticklace, and the sea-mew, and all the feathered broods that rear their young on the rocky cliff-shelves in the summer time, twisted themselves upon their terraces as the great procession, bearing the body, passed, but gave no other sign. The convoy sail sheer for the steep when, suddenly, the adamant cliff opens, and the ships steal in between two plumb rock-walls that tower several hundreds of feet into the blue. These rise from the base, clean cut as if from the chisels of the gods, and you hear the waters, as deep at the foot of the cliff as in the channel's centre, lapping against the rock as the ships move in. Cannon look down into the vessels' decks from the forts on the hill-tops, and a chain stretches across the narrow water-path—a path so narrow that you listen, as each ship passes in, to hear the grim rocks gride her sides. This was a more glorious sight for the prince, if he was able to appreciate it, than all the arches green bushes could make, all the mottoes that committees could devise, all the addresses that mayors and corporations could grind out upon pink-bordered vellum. We are not aware, however, that the great Architect of the universe fashioned the St. John's Narrows merely to give a pleasant surprise to the prince of Wales in 1860. From Newfoundland the young gentleman sailed for Halifax, and thence proceeded to St. John and Fredericton, N. B., in all of which cities he was honoured to the fullest extent of the people's ingenuity. From Fredericton the party proceeded to the little, flat meadow-province, with the coy motto, "Parva sub ingente"; and from its capital set out for Canada. At Gaspé, famous lobster-fishing grounds, they were met by the governor-general and the members of his ministry. A grand reception took place on the 18th of August at Quebec, and, on the 21st, both branches of the legislature presented addresses to his royal highness expressing their loyalty and devotion to the throne and person of his mother. Before the prince came out they created him vice-king of all the British North American colonies, so that he had the power of turning any inhabitant he chose into a knight on coming here. Messrs. N. F. Belleau and Henry Smith, speakers of both houses of parliament, had the dignity of knighthood conferred upon them—and felt more comfortable for the rest of their lives. On the 25th of the month the prince accomplished the task for which he came over here. He laid the keystone of the arch of Victoria Bridge, and fastened the last of a million rivets. Some mothers had babes afflicted with king's evil, which they were going to carry to the prince that he might lay his hand upon and cure them; but some of the fathers and grandmothers said it would be no use, as he was not yet a king; that only the king or the queen had the "virtue in the hand." A week after the prince had finished Victoria Bridge he laid the foundation stone of the proposed parliament buildings at Ottawa. He did not, we must say to his credit, ridicule the day's operations to his guardian when they were both alone in the evening, like a near ancestor of his, who, having performed a similar task, said contemptuously to some of his suite that he was "tired of this ditch digging." The prince then made a progress through the western portion of the province, visiting the chief towns and cities in the route. The populace was giddy with excitement, and each city tried to outdo its neighbour in rearing arches and flaunting welcome-legends. The Orangemen of Kingston, Belleville, and Toronto exhumed the cerements of the Orange king, and hung them on arches, but, in the latter city, the regal party turned their horses' heads and proceeded by another street. The Duke of Newcastle declared that he would lend no countenance to displays of party that were not conducive to the public peace and good-will. The Orangemen took bitter revenge on the duke, for they burnt himself and the governor-general that night on Colborne street. The fuel, however, was only effigies. Before setting out for Canada the hospitalities of the republic were offered the Queen for her son by President Buchanan, should he choose to pay a visit to the United States. After the Canadian visit had ended, the prince and his suite accepted the president's invitation, and the reception met everywhere in the republic was so cordial that the Duke of Newcastle declared that the visit did more to cement a hearty feeling between the two countries than half a century of diplomacy. But the duke was not a seer, and could not forecast some threatening clouds soon to cover the face of the bright sky. The calculation of the diplomatist after all is a science as inexact as that of the weather prophet.

During the autumn Sir Allan MacNab, like the ghost of Hamlet, appeared again upon the scene, and was elected to the upper house. In 1856 we dropped some tears over the old man as we saw him, swathed in flannel and racked with pain, bidding a long farewell to his companions in the assembly. Shortly after the scene was ended a baronetcy was conferred upon the deposed leader, whereupon he mastered his gout for the nonce, and turned his face toward England, where, near his sovereign, he resolved to spend the remainder of his days. He had not been well settled in England, when, bethinking him of his career and honours, and how dear he must be to the heart of the empire, he persuaded himself that he could defeat Admiral Pechel, who was a parliamentary candidate for the town of Brighton. But the triumph of the admiral helped the poor baronet somewhat to realize that he had probably overrated his standing with the empire; and he returned to Canada, to be elected, as we have seen, in 1860, to the legislative council.

The session of 1861 was interesting to those who had begun to look with alarm upon the ever-increasing strength of the reform party. It is related by those who were intimate friends of Mr. John A. Macdonald, at this time, that he was not less "busy holding his own party together, than keeping his opponents in hot water among themselves." It is not known in what way he succeeded in promoting discord in the ranks of his opponents, but he remarked one day quite early in the session, while some ministers sat smoking in the council chamber: "John Sandfield is at last in our service; he is now on Brown's track." It must not be understood that there was any collusion between the two Macdonalds, nor is it above question that the attorney-general-west was responsible for some of the discords among the reformers attributed to his "machinations." His readiness in penetrating the situation of his opponents, and his accuracy in forecasting their movements, often led less powerful observers to believe that he had originated the discords he foretold. Notwithstanding the tact and finesse of Mr. Cartier, several of his prominent followers began to break away from restraint, and range themselves in opposition. For the past two sessions one man alone maintained the government in power, and that man was George Brown. "If anything should happen to Brown," Macdonald used frequently to say jocosely, though the joke was pregnant of truth, "the government would be done for." The movement to which we have already referred, in the reform ranks, and which John A. Macdonald had predicted, now became apparent to the public. John Sandfield Macdonald and George Brown could no longer disguise their hostility for each other; and the public saw that there was a struggle between the two men for the mantle of leadership. But so long as the rivals stood in the same parliament, which ever succeeded, the government had nothing to fear. Yet Mr.

Cartier changed colour when he learnt that Messieurs Sicotte and Loranger had forsaken him and leagued themselves with Mr. J. S. Macdonald. Mr. Dorion, to whom the friendship of Mr. Brown was not always beneficent, was removed from the leadership of the Lower Canada opposition on no other grounds than that he had been on terms of political intimacy with the man who was an enemy "to the religion, the institutions, and the very existence of the French people." Yet Mr. Brown wanted to heal "sectional differences" between the two provinces; and Alexander Mackenzie says Sir Edmund Head was guilty of treachery in not giving Mr. Brown an opportunity to do what he intended. A few weeks before the opening of the session, a census had been taken, which showed that the population of Upper Canada was 300,000 in excess of that of Lower Canada, though twenty years before, at the formation of the union, the population of the lower province exceeded that of the upper by 200,000. The logic of these figures, in the contest for representation by population, was irresistible, though Mr. Cartier resisted the measure with a fervour that seemed like ferocity, and vowed that he would never consent to a change which aimed to sacrifice the interests of his section of the province. Mr. Cartier has been censured for taking this attitude by several writers, who view the question from their own peculiar ground and the present time; and one of these tells us in referring to Mr. Cartier, that "on this particular question the lawyer and the sectionalist were seen everywhere, the statesman and the Canadian nowhere." * The writer of this assertion ought to have remembered that union was not granted to Lower Canada, but forced upon her; and that by the terms of union she was allotted only as many members as Upper Canada, though her population exceeded the latter's by 200,000, at a time, when, to all observers, the possibilities of increase in the upper province were no greater than those of the lower. But while this might have served as a justifiable excuse for the ground taken by Lower-Canada statesmen in opposing the demand for increased representation for the upper province, because the population of the latter exceeded that of her partner by 300,000, there was a reason overshadowing this why no alteration should be made, a reason that also absolves Mr. John A. Macdonald and his Upper Canada colleagues from the imputation of disloyalty to their own section by supporting the position of Mr. Cartier. The very virtue of the union consisted in the equality of political power held by each section of the united province; whereas, the moment that balance was destroyed, a larger representation given to one portion of the province than to the other, the virtue departed, and one section became bound neck and heel to the will of the greater forever. There were two ways by which justice could be done to one and both: these were union on terms of equality, or separation. There was one other alternative, but it lay far in the back ground, and that the plan of giving to each section a parliament to deal with its local affairs, and the establishment of a supreme legislature, with jurisdiction over such measures as were common to both. But so long as the union was maintained, and the wisdom of the connection under the circumstances no one is blind enough to believe, it was the duty of Mr. Cartier and of John A. Macdonald, and of every man to whom justice was dearer than any interest, even the interest of their own section, to resist the scheme for the adjustment of representation by population, though the inhabitants of Ontario exceeded those of Quebec by two to one. Yet the people of the upper province whose minds were excited by demagogues, were not in a mood to do justice; and on the eve of the elections, which took place in the summer, it was evident that the ministry would have difficulty in breasting the current. Among several other charges brought against the administration on trial before the constituencies, was that of having kept Mr. Joseph Morrison in the council despite the fierce remonstrances of the house, and the bitter, but reasonable, censure of the reform press. The action of Mr. Macdonald in retaining Mr. Morrison in the ministry, for we believe the action to have been his, passes our understanding, and seems like the infatuation that has sometimes led sovereigns to retain favourite ministers against the will of the nation, though, through their obstinacy, their thrones have trembled.

Meanwhile the country was in a gale of excitement anent the "election campaign." Several stalwart warriors fell in the battle. Mr. John Crawford, a prominent politician in his day, vanquished George Brown in east Toronto; while the whilom friendship of the Reform leader proved fatal to the fortunes of Messieurs Dorion, Thibaudeau and Lemieux in Lower Canada. For the first time when the new parliament met the sharp, matter-of-fact face of Mr. Alexander Mackenzie was seen at one of the desks. The figures of Henri Gustave Joly and Henry Elezeur Taschereau were likewise seen there for the first time. Mackenzie represented Lambton. In 1842, being then in his twentieth year, he came from Perthshire, Scotland, to Canada, and settled at Kingston; but removed thence five years later, to the neighbourhood of Sarnia where he plied the trade of a stone mason, and engaged in large building operations. It soon became apparent that he was a man of superior ability—though self-made—of untiring industry, and that he possessed a character of the highest integrity. He was a pronounced reformer from the time of his settlement in Canada, and seemed to be drawn towards George Brown, who was like himself of humble origin, and a Scotchman. For a time Mr. Mackenzie edited a reform newspaper in Sarnia, and in 1861, when his brother, Mr. Hope F. Mackenzie decided not to again become a candidate for Lambton, which he lately represented, Alexander appeared, and, as we have seen, was successful. We shall find a good deal more to say of Mr. Mackenzie, who is not our ideal of a statesman—(but who certainly makes a better statesman than a historian) as our story progresses, and shall not anticipate.

In October Sir Edmund Head set out for England, his term of administration having expired. A wrecked ambition never lacks bitterness towards the rock on which it finds disaster. It was no wonder then that the Globe pelted the departing viceroy with every missile at its hand. But through all the turmoil of party strife, the governor, if we have read the records aright, did his duty with resolute and dignified judgment; although he refused to do an act which was inexpedient, untimely and improper, merely because it would forward Mr. Brown's ambition. There may have been better governors in Canada than Sir Edmund Head, but we are unable to discern any errors of judgment in his administration; or the trace of any act that shows he did not strive to the fullest of his powers to do his duty. Despite the violence of the Globe, and the animus of Mr. Alexander Mackenzie, he appears to all impartial readers of Canadian history as an honest man. Sir Edmund's successor to the governorship was Lord Monck, who reached Quebec, in October, 1861. The new governor, the fourth viscount of Monck, was born at Templemore, in the County of Tipperary, Ireland, in 1819. He was a descendant of the Le Moynes, an ancient and honourable Norman family. He was called to the Irish bar and sat in the commons for some years as a representative for the English constituency of Portsmouth. Under the Palmerston administration he was appointed lord of the treasury, and was a respectable, though not a brilliant, figure in the government. In 1857 he failed to secure reëlection, and dropped out of public life till his appointment to the governorship of Canada. The new governor reached us at a time when there were forebodings, on the American continent, of the mightiest civil war that the world has ever seen. The presidential contest in the United States during the preceding year had been attended with public excitement strained to the highest pitch, and had resulted in the election of Abraham Lincoln, a noted republican and an uncompromising enemy to slavery. The causes of hostility between the north and south were the questions of slavery and of trade. The great bulk of southern wealth consisted of large plantations tilled by negro slaves, who were driven and whipped like beasts. Upon these plantations grew cotton, tobacco and rice, which the planters sent to the north, or exported to the great markets of Europe. The abolition of slavery would deprive the plantation owner of the cheap labour of the slaves, while the establishment of a protective policy would bring a tax-burthen without any benefit, as the commerce of the South consisted in the products of the plantations, which were exported raw, while manufacturing formed but a small factor of trade. On the 20th of December, 1861, a day well remembered in American annals, the legislature of South Carolina passed an ordinance of secession. The people of this state had for many years maintained that each state in the confederacy was sovereign and independent, and had the right to separate itself from the union whenever it chose. Fired by the example of South Carolina ten other states, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Texas, Tennessee, North Carolina, Arkansas, and Eastern Virginia, also seceded, and constituted themselves into a separate republic under the presidency of Jefferson Davis. The population of the union before the secession was about 31,000,000; the population of the Southern Confederacy was 9,000,000 of which 3,000,000 were slaves. Within the Southern Confederacy was Fort Sumter, a garrison held by Northern troops, and against this the cannon of Charleston hurled its rebellious thunder. Seeing the whole country around him under hostile arms, the commandant laid down his sword. The North made no delay, but sprang to arms to maintain the integrity of the republic. The booming of the guns before Fort Sumter must have sounded loud in the ears of Great Britain, for a month after the surrender of the fort a royal proclamation was issued calling upon British subjects everywhere to maintain a neutrality during the war. The British cabinet had fallen into the common delusion of supposing that one swallow makes a summer; that the triumph of the Charleston guns meant victory and stability for the southern confederacy. The proclamation may have only been the faux pas of a stupid minister, though this view is hardly tenable, but it was regarded by the United States government as a deliberate insult, and a recognition of a cluster of rebellious states as an independent power. President Lincoln called upon every state true to the union to make ready its quota of armed men to send into the field; and proclaimed a blockade of the southern ports. The war had not progressed very far when it became apparent that the Duke of Newcastle had overestimated the importance of the prince's visit to the United States. The imperial government, in many ways, had unwisely permitted the world to see its hostility to the north and friendship for the south; while a large portion of the Canadian public, dutifully, though not less rashly and stupidly, reëchoed the sentiment of the mother-land. We presume there is some code of honour among nations as well as men; but it is hard to see by what code went Great Britain in conniving at the independence of a body of rebels, and in regarding citizens of a sovereign state, in unlawful revolt, as an independent power. If a band of Irishmen, to-morrow, were to fling the lord-lieutenant into the Liffey, pull down the union jack, and set up the green flag upon the hill of Tara, Englishmen would surely consider that Prussia had outraged the code of national honour, and levelled a gross insult at the British empire, did Frederick William issue a proclamation commanding all his subjects to preserve neutrality during the "war" between England and Ireland. But the United States government had graver grounds for complaint against the British nation: southern privateers, as piratical as partisan, pounced out of British ports, and harassed the merchant shipping of the north. The most noted of these cruisers was the Alabama, of which we shall hear again. Notwithstanding, we say, that the prince of Wales had visited the United States a year before, a feeling of hostility was aroused in the north against the British nation for her indiscreet sympathy with the rebellion. Hot-headed republicans stood for a moment upon their own hotly-fought fields, and turned their eyes towards Canadian territory, muttering that thither lay their duty next; turned again and faced the rebel. On the 8th of November, 1861, the British mail-steamer, Trent, was pursuing her way in the Bahama channel, one morning, with mails and passengers, when an American ship of war, San Jacinto, cannon scowling through her port-holes, bore down, fired a shot across the steamer's bows, and putting out boats swarming with blue jackets, armed to the teeth, took forcible possession of two passengers, Mason and Sliddel, southern commissioners, on their way to England. This act of national piracy was hailed with enthusiasm by the northern states, and Wilkes, the captain of the piratical man-of-war, became the hero of the hour. When the mail steamer reached England and made known the story of the outrage, the government at once demanded that the commissioners be rendered up, and intimated that a refusal would be regarded as a declaration of war. While we are among those who glory in British valour, we are not one of those whose blood comes tingling to their cheek as they read of how promptly the British lion arose to his feet when the captain of the Trent told his story. The northern states were already locked in a struggle with the south, and a small foreign force could give a disastrous turn to the scale. That was the secret of the promptitude. While British troops were yet upon the ocean, bound for American territory, President Lincoln quietly surrendered the commissioners, who sailed from Boston to England on the first day of the new year. When the Guards and Rifles arrived in St. John, New Brunswick, the cloud had blown over, though an intense feeling of hostility existed in the northern states towards Canada. Invasion had been predicted by the timid ones among us, and at once our volunteers looked to their arms. Measures for the organization of militia companies were put on foot; every Canadian youth old enough to carry a rifle exhibited an enthusiasm for drill. To the impartial reader, now, it seemed as if we were anxious in Canada for a little war, just for exercise or recreation. While we were preparing to resist an invasion, we were nurturing a cause for invasion. While our school boys and their fathers were asking for rifles, to defend the homes of their sisters and wives, we were giving harbourage and hospitality to southern rebels, who harassed American settlements and the government troops from our border territory.

The first parliament under Lord Monck met in March, 1862. In the speech from the throne it was stated that Her Majesty recognised the loyalty of her subjects in their conduct through the Trent embroglio, but it is not unlikely that self-preservation rather than extreme solicitation about a sovereign two thousand miles beyond the reach of American bullets, dictated the attitude of Canadians. Once for all, let us say, that should an enemy, be he ever so insignificant or ever so great, threaten our homes and our country, we shall be ready to do all that we can to repel him for our own sakes; and after our selfish duty has been done, if there is a "man with soul so dead" as to say that it was a "selfish" duty, we shall not consider ourselves entitled to eulogiums for loyalty to a throne and a person that we were not thinking about when fighting the foe, and which were two thousand miles out of harm's way.

To satisfy the feeling of uneasiness abroad, the speech recommended the reorganization of the Canadian Militia, and attorney-general Macdonald set himself to work to frame a bill. He counted on the support of a majority from his own section of the province, and relied on M. Cartier for the rest. Of late he stood higher in the affections of Upper Canada, than ever before; for during several years he had been believed, by the larger portion of the people, to have had little regard for the interests of his own section, and to have maintained a league with the French for the sake of office. But previous to the late general election, the conviction came upon a great many of his harsh judges, that there might be another side to the stories told by the Globe, and its followers; that he may have been wrongfully accused, and the victim of an unscrupulous and disappointed ambition. And so deep grew this impression that the traduced attorney-general was invited cordially, nay entreated, to visit their towns and cities. He consented, and made what may be called, without exaggeration, a triumphal tour through Toronto, Hamilton, London, Simcoe, Brantford, Dunnville, St. Thomas, Guelph, St. Catharines, Belleville, and a number of other lesser towns, at each of which he addressed large assemblages. All were captivated by the address of the man, and won over by his defence of himself and the government; yea, those who had been taught to believe him the ally of the French, and the enemy of his own, cheered him to the echo. Everywhere he was received with cordial and spontaneous welcome, and his tour placed the government in a favourable light before the province. Nor had his uncompromising and manly attitude of resistance to the agitation for representation by population, the effect of lessening him in the esteem of the people of Upper Canada; rather, it won for him their hearty respect.

One of the ablest speeches he has ever delivered was made in defence of the ministry's attitude in resisting the question of representation by population. We who dream of the day when the reproach of colonialism shall be a thing of the past, and Canada be ranked among the independent nations, read with pleasure an outburst of eloquence touching this fond hope of ours, and firing, while restraining, our ambition. It is impossible not to believe that if the man who uttered the following words were not a minister of the crown, we should have had the hopes without the limitations. Said Mr. Macdonald: "I trust that for ages, for ever, Canada may remain united with the mother country. But we are fast ceasing to be a dependency, and assuming the position of an ally of Great Britain. England will be the centre, surrounded and sustained by an alliance not only with Canada, but Australia, and all her other possessions ; and there will thus be formed an immense confederation of freemen, the greatest confederacy of civilized and intelligent men that ever has had an existence on the face of the globe." To the greatness predicted of our future 'in this thrilling picture, only, however, can we subscribe ; for we cannot conceive of that "alliance," which means equality, on which the speaker in the fervour of the moment dwells, and the connexion which makes us subject and inferior as being the same thing ; or, of being sister to imperial greatness, when our highest distinction is to be ruled by a subject.

Early in the session some changes were made in the cabinet. Mr. Ross resigned the presidency of the council, and retired from the government ; Mr. Sherwood assumed the commissionership of crown lands, and John Carling succeeded him in the receiver-generalship. Mr. John Beverley Robinson, a lawyer with a clear and well-balanced head, took the presidency of the council ; and James Patton, whose lucky star was John A. Macdonald's friendship, became solicitor-general. These new members of the ministry were favourable to representation by population, but the question was left an open one in the cabinet. Mr. Robinson was re-elected for Toronto West, and Mr. Carling for London, but Mr. Paton who represented the Saugeen division in the legislative council was rejected by his constituents. He nevertheless retained his portfolio, as Joseph Morrison, who by this time had escaped to the bench, had done before him ; for Mr. Macdonald, in this case, too, was stronger than the constitution.

Brown out of the legislature, the opposition was no longer a mere butt for reproach, but a dangerous and rapidly-increasing combination. It resisted the address with stubborn pluck, and fought not as had been its wont under the somewhat tyrannous leadership of George Brown, in detached eddies, but, powerfully, as a unit. A vote was taken on a resolution virtually affirming want of confidence, but it was defeated by a majority of 17, and the ministry breathed easy. Nevertheless causes were at work undermining public confidence in the administration. On the parliament-buildings question a dangerous discussion arose. It was shown that $900,000, appropriated for the construction of the buildings, had been all expended, besides several large amounts not authorized by parliament, and yet the structure was not half completed. Affairs in the department of public works, at the head of which was Mr. Rose, were in a scandalous plight, and the minister was charged with incompetency—which was glaring—and corruption. In the letting of contracts, large sums had been lost to the public by dishonest means, or an incompetency that, so far as it related to the country's interests, was as criminal as corruption. Of the two, the dishonest and the incapable minister, we believe the former is the preferable, his competency granted. For a capable minister can be watched into doing the right, be he ever so corrupt in intention; but hope in an incapable minister may be a will-o'-the-wisp to lead to disaster. The ministry, though not responsible, was held accountable for the shortcomings of Mr. Rose, and it soon became known that its tenure of life was maintained by a slim thread.

While affairs were in this state, Mr. John A. Macdonald introduced his Militia bill, a measure that made ample provision to resist invasion, but which would have required an expenditure beyond the convenient ability of the province to meet. Mr. Macdonald could, usually, at a glance, see the dangers in his course, but on this occasion the future was inexorable. He introduced his bill. It was supported warmly by a considerable majority from the Upper Canada section, but Mr. Cartier's followers, in the hour of trial, pretending to be alarmed at the burthen threatened in the bill, proved faithless, and the measure was rejected by a vote of 61 to 54. On the following day the government resigned.

In the emergency the governor had recourse to John Sandfield Macdonald, whose eyes lit up when the aide-de-camp handed him a note from the head of the government; and on the 24th of May, while cannon was thundering its rejoicings proper to the Queen's natal day, the Macdonald-Sicotte ministry was sworn into office. We give the personnel of the new government, and glancing down the names one is reminded of the "Who? Who?" administration in England whose membership so sorely puzzled the Duke of Wellington. There were

Two days later, Mr. Wallbridge announced the ministerial programme in the house of assembly. The double-majority principle, so far as related to purely local questions, was admitted, and a measure was promised that would provide "a more equitable adjustment of the parliamentary representation." The new government was determined to carry out its every act of policy according to that high standard of purity, efficiency, and proper economy that always guides the actions of incoming administrations. A thorough cleansing was to be given to the

Augean stables, a complete system of "retrenchment,"—that word which has covered more extravagance since the establishment of legislatures than any other expression known to our English tongue—was to be inaugurated; a most searching investigation of affairs in that "pent-house of corruption," as one young legislator—who had not yet been afforded an opportunity of soiling his own hands by corrupt transactions—called the Board of Works office, was to be made; and the government pledged itself to abide by the decision of Her Majesty with reference to the seat of government, though the greater portion of the new ministry's timber had signalized themselves particularly by opposition to the choice of Ottawa by the sovereign, and had made the question the basis of non-confidence motions against the late administration. To all who understood that, while the union was maintained, a scheme for representation by population was incompatible with justice to one section or the other of the province, the decision of the new ministry, to allow the question to stand, was learnt without surprise. John A. Macdonald said to his colleagues: "We shall have Brown with us again; not that he cares so much for Rep. by Pop., but he wants to be at John Sandfield;" and while he was yet speaking, it is related, a copy of the Globe came in, with every battery opened upon the new ministry. After a fierce article had been read aloud, Macdonald asked Cartier: "In what way would Brown have been able to carry off his feelings against John Sandfield had they not providentially repudiated Rep. by Pop.?" At the formation of the Brown-Dorion administration, a coldness had appeared between John Sandfield and George Brown, which grew in course of time into active hostility. Both men were ambitious, the former wanting to live himself, but willing that others also should exist; the latter determined that no one but himself should live, and ready, with the engine with which he destroyed character, to crush any one who crossed the path of his ambition. He sorely felt that during the two last sessions of parliament his party had repudiated his leadership and chosen Macdonald in his stead; now in his rage and disappointment he almost forgot that his constituents had likewise repudiated him, and looked upon the new premier as having usurped a place belonging to himself. John Sandfield solaced himself by saying, "Let the heathen rage" when he received the first broadside of the Globe's "afflicting thunder;" but it was not a trivial matter for a prime minister to have arrayed against him the most powerful newspaper of his party. Meanwhile the ex-ministers offered no obstruction to the new administration at the polls, or in finishing the programme of legislation.

The defeat of Mr. John A. Macdonald's militia bill, as he conjectured himself, was regarded in England as a measure of the practical loyalty of Canadians. The Times which had, on several previous occasions, displayed its coloniphobia, if we may be permitted to coin that word, led off by a rebuke to Canadians, which was taken up by a multitude of the minor newspapers, who declared that we were an assemblage of greedy self-seekers, without gratitude or loyalty, or even the instinct, common to the animal, of self-defence. One organ urged the British government to "shake off the unprofitable colonies" and leave them to the mercy of the first comer; another said we brought neither strength nor profit to the empire, and that any loyalty we had was in our breeches' pocket. Lord Palmerston's face turned purple as he told in his place in the commons that Her Majesty's government had done all for the Canadians in assisting them to procure defences that they intended to do, and that it now rested with the colonists to do the remainder themselves, or to "disgrace the stock from which they sprang." At a dinner in Montreal, Lord Monck feebly reëchoed the imperial sentiment, preferring to trust the impressions of the home ministry and an uninformed press to the facts of the case which were plain to every Canadian. Mr. John A. Macdonald's bill was an admirable measure, but the house weighed the cost of the scheme against the danger of invasion, and rejected it. It was not true, though Lord Palmerston and the British press seem to have been differently informed, that the Canadians were relying upon imperial soldiers to fight for them in the day of trouble: though they rejected a measure which, whether rightly or wrongly, they regarded unwarranted by the expediency of the time, they never once thought of shirking the defence of their country and homes should the occasion come. As we have, however, seen, the loss of the measure was due to the defection of the French-Canadian members among whom a threat of invasion created no serious panic, and who, if the truth could be known, cared very little, since their destiny was that of a conquered people, whether their masters were republican English or monarchical English. But in Mr. Macdonald's measure all the British spirit, all the loyalty to Canadian welfare found expression, as was shown by the considerable majority from the upper province by which the bill was supported.* There was no invasion; but this fact was not any more foreknown to those who rejected the attorney-general's means for defence, than it was brought about by disarming resistance at such a critical time. "All's well that ends well," is the maxim of the fatalist, and the prophet; for the one is the bondsman of the event and the other foresees it: on occasions where stupidity or recklessness fail to provoke disaster, it often becomes triumphant justification.

The war in the republic was a harvest-time for Canada. The army raised by President Lincoln to subdue the South had been in a large measure, taken away from the field, and the workshop. Canada was overrun by persons from the United States who bought up everything that we had to sell. For our staple articles of food, for cattle, poultry, eggs and grain they paid almost fabulous prices. Government agents ran over the country with pockets full of gold purchasing horses for the northern cavalry; and many a farmer, tempted by a pouch of shining eagles, sold his best team from the plough. Warned by the results of over speculation during the Crimean war, the community launched out into no extravagant enterprises, but, with prudence, made the most of their neighbours' misfortune.

During the summer the gout accomplished its victory over Sir Allan MacNab, and the gallant knight, loaded with honours which give little joy to a dying man, passed to that bourne whence no traveller returns. His place, as speaker of the legislative council, was filled by Mr., now Sir Alexander, Campbell, a popular and clear-headed Kingston lawyer, who, as we have seen, studied law many years previously in the office of Mr. John A. Macdonald, and had subsequently been in a legal partnership with that gentleman.

Parliament met on the 12th of February. The government now, to use the phrase of the ex-attorney-general-west, had "lived long enough." Enemies began to arise in every quarter, and South Oxford had just sent a thorn in the person of George Brown. He was full of the accumulated energy of two years, and at once bitterly assailed his rival, John Sandfield Macdonald, for infidelity to the principles of non-sectarian schools, and representation by population. A small but bellicose band of Liberals rallied around their imperious chief, and threw themselves in with the liberal-conservatives whenever the latter assaulted the ministry. It will be remembered that the premier took office affirming the double majority principle, yet, when a large majority of the Upper Canada section voted against his school measure, he refused to resign. Early in May, John A. Macdonald informed his party that he had decided to move a want of confidence in the ministry. Some prominent liberal-conservatives did not approve of the step, but counselled delay till further defection took place in the ministerial side; but the ex-attorney-general-west assured them that he was certain of a majority, and pointed out that there was no object in further delay. Two days later he rose in his place and moved a direct non-confidence motion. John Sandfield's eyes twinkled nervously, but he assumed a bold air, and sat upright at his desk. He knew his government had received the grave censure of those from whom it ought to have looked for support, but he did not believe that the majority was willing that he should be hurled from power. John Sandfield's glance was quick, and, as far as it went, took an accurate survey of things; but in this case, as in many others, he argued upon sentiment, while his more astute rival concluded from fact. The ministry was defeated by a majority of five votes. The premier hastened to the governor and asked for a prorogation with a view to dissolution, which was granted. The dissolution followed immediately, and the election writs were made returnable in July. In Upper Canada, the result of the election showed some important gains to the ministry, but this was balanced by fully as many losses in the lower province. After much shuffling in the cabinet, and the total foundering of the Lower Canada section, on the 12th of August, a new administration was formed as follows:—

crew overboard; but like the malignant Schriften in Marryatt's book, they never failed to appear for vengeance at an unexpected moment. It was not wise, surely, to throw over such men as Thomas D'Arcy McGee, M. Sicotte, and the late post-master-general, M. H. Foley. Office being more to these politicians, at least at this time, than principles, they joined the opposition into whose ranks they were warmly welcomed by John A. Macdonald, and assailed their former chief in unmeasured language. They charged him with betraying his trust as a leading minister of the crown, and with having descended to acts of personal meanness and treachery to prop up his party. The premier's eyes glowed like live coals as he hurled back the charges of baseness and political perfidy on the heads of his accusers; and where he received only censure from friendly members, he so lashed the critics as to turn them into enemies upon the spot. One of the premier's faults, and a grave failing in a party leader, was, that, under the stress of feeling, he could not keep a bridle upon his tongue, should the outburst put his government in jeopardy. The fruitless session came to an end in October. The premier was hopeful, but his opponent and namesake assured him, on the day of prorogation, in the smoking-room, that he was "nearing the end of his tether." Towards the close of the year—1863—Mr. Albert Norton Richards was appointed to the vacant solicitor-generalship for Upper Canada, and returned for re-election to his constituency, South Leeds. But before the new minister reached the hustings, he learned, to his dismay, that Messrs. John A. Macdonald and Thomas D'Arcy McGee were abroad in his constituency. What was worse, the two clever oppositionists shadowed him wherever he appeared, and, whenever they believed he had made a telling point, afterwards addressed the audience, and turned the government and its new minister into contempt. The close of the poll revealed that the member who, a few months before, had been returned by 135 votes more than his opponent, was now beaten by a majority of 75. If, during the summer of 1883, a similar event should occur, we are sure that a certain newspaper would affirm that Mr. Richards "lost his seat through the corrupting influences in the hands of Sir John Macdonald," and that public money "was lavishly and unblushingly employed." The defeated solicitor-general resigned his office, but John Sandfield, who ignored logic and indications, would not take the hint, but threw himself upon fate. With an evil star lowering upon the ministry's fortunes, the house met on the 19th of February. The "governor's speech," as it is called, by its silence upon any discussion-provoking policy, revealed the fears of the government. The opposition ignored this languid ministerial document, but made a violent onslaught upon the wretched ministry. It was apparent that, if legislation was the business of the house, it had met in the winter of 1864 to no purpose: up to the 21st of March no important work had been done. On that day, disgusted with the ungenerousness of fate, the premier and his ministry resigned. The governor was perplexed, and began to grow apprehensive for the well-being of the constitution. The peculiar position of parties produced a hopeless dilemma, and without faith that any member of the legislature could form an administration that would endure, Lord Monck entrusted the formation of a ministry to the ex-provincial-secretary, Mr. Fergusson-Blair. That gentleman's exertions failed; and Mr. Cartier was next called on and made the attempt, but with a similar result. His excellency then requested Sir Etienne, formerly known as Colonel, Taché to address himself to the task; and that gentleman, who enjoyed the respect and good-will of his compatriots, though anxious to be rid of the turmoil of administration, in obedience to the duty he owed his country, consented, and at once put himself in communication with John A. Macdonald, who undertook the formation of the Upper Canada section of the cabinet. Several days were occupied in making the arrangements, and, in view of the fact that the late ministry had resigned while having a small majority in the house, no one believed that any ingenuity or skill could fashion an administration that would survive. The virtue seemed to have gone out of the theory of responsible government, and the device of party appeared powerless to produce majority and minority. On the 30th of the month it was announced, however, that a ministry had been formed; and for the second time a Taché-Macdonald government came into existence, and was as follows:—

M. Cauchon, in French, and John Hillyard Cameron, in English, explained to the house the policy of the administration, which, in the most important respects was a determination to pay strict attention to the provincial defences, to organize the militia on an efficient basis, to endeavour to maintain and extend the reciprocity treaty and to establish more intimate commercial relations with the maritime provinces. It goes without saying that to “departmental reform” and “retrenchment,”—but one wonders, with every incoming party effecting departmental reform and retrenching, how anything could remain to be reformed, or how a dollar could exist to be retrenched—above all things, the new government pledged itself, while the question of representation by population was allowed to remain open. On the following day the house adjourned to meet again on the 3rd of May. No one who penetrated the situation, and saw that the same causes which, of late, had overthrown ministries formed from every side, and of every combination, still remained, believed that the new administration could exist. There was only one other chance, and that was existence by the sufferance of the opposition; but John Sandfield Macdonald, though it were to save the constitution from ruin, was not likely to extend mercy to the men who had so rudely thrown himself from power. Meanwhile, public sentiment was, unconsciously and by the force of circumstances, being gradually prepared to accomplish an event which was to triumph over turmoil, to set the wheels of government rolling afresh, and to give a new and fuller impulse to our political existence, and a lasting direction to the current of our history. While the greatest crisis in our Canadian annals was approaching, Herr von Bismarck, who had hitherto been regarded by the world as a "fanatical reactionary, a coarse sort of Metternich, a combination of bully and buffoon," suddenly revealed a genius as daring, as crafty, and as competent as Cavour, with a wider field and greater powers for action than the Italian statesman; at this time, too, came Garibaldi in state to London, whose workshops and stately West-End dwellings sent out their throngs of enthusiastic artizans, and peers and countesses, to do homage to the soldier of fortune; at this time it was that England's grand old statesman, in his eightieth year, in the growing morning, reviewed, as one glances his eye along some panorama, the history of his political administration, made his last great speech before stepping out of the commons and entering the portal which guards the entrance to that realm from which no traveller comes back.

CHAPTER XV.

FRUITS OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

“SCYLLA is passed; Charybdis appears.” The Trent vanishes; the Alabama is in sight. On the morning that the San Jacinto brought her prisoners into port, the citizens of the north set up a loud hurrah, and cried lustily for the daring commander, whom they would have borne on a chair through their cities. Some of the cooler heads, however, began to consider the situation, and derived little comfort from their reflections. This valiant deed of the San Jacinto's commander, they now saw, was a repetition of the outrage committed by England against the United States in 1807. During the year named, while several British men-of-war were lying at anchor in Chesapeake Bay, a number of blue-jackets deserted, and enlisted on board the United States frigate, Chesapeake. A few weeks after the occurrence, some British officers were on shore in Norfolk, Virginia, and saw the deserters parade the streets, protected by the American flag, and under the escort of a recruiting officer. They at once asked for the surrender of the men, and their demand was seconded by the British consul; but the officer refused to render them up. Nothing more was said at the time, and there was some chuckling on board the American ships of war over the occurrence. The following day, however, a long-boat from the British flag-ship, admiral Berkley, visited each English war-ship in port, leaving a sealed despatch. Each captain was instructed by the admiral to keep a sharp look-out for the American frigate Chesapeake, when at sea, out of the limits of the United States, and to search the said vessel for the deserted seamen ; and enjoined that, should any American war-ship insist on searching a British vessel for a similar purpose, no resistance should be offered. On the morning of the 22nd of June, His Majesty's ship Leopard, captain Humphreys, put out to sea, and about fourteen miles from land met the Chesapeake, commodore Barren. He hailed, and said he had despatches for the commodore from the commander-in-chief. The Chesapeake hove to, and was boarded by an officer from the Leopard, who bore Berkley's orders, and a letter from captain Humphreys expressing the wish that he might be able to carry out the admiral's order in an amicable manner. The commodore was surprised, but firm. He said he could not think of agreeing to the request, that his orders from government forbidding any foreigner to muster his ship's company were most peremptory ; that he had no deserters on board, and, finally, that he must refuse, once for all, to allow his ship to be searched. On receiving this answer, the Leopard edged down towards the Chesapeake, captain Humphreys again hailing, and stating that "Commodore Barren must be aware that the orders of the British commander-in-chief must be obeyed." To this the answer given from the American ship was, "I do not understand you ;" whereupon there was a quiet movement, with the regularity of clock-work, on board the frigate, who promptly fired a shot across the bows of the Chesapeake. After a minute another shot was fired ; then there was a pause of two minutes ; and, the American ship giving no answer, a broadside was poured into her. The Chesapeake stood, like a stripling of fifteen, with folded arms, before a burly bully who has already delivered his insignificant adversary a stunning blow, and did not return the fire. But after a few moments' pause, and in that awful silence when the only sound to be heard was the beating of the seamen's hearts, commodore Barren hailed, and said he wished to send a boat on board ; but the Leopard believing that the Chesapeake was preparing to return the fire, regarded the request as only a ruse, and poured in two more murderous broadsides. Barren then struck his colours, and two lieutenants with several midshipmen entered his ship to make search for the deserters. They captured, after a three hours' search, four of the delinquents; two others were identified among the slain, and one jumped overboard, and perished. Six of the Chesapeake's crew were killed, twenty-four were wounded, and commodore Barren, who acted throughout with the utmost coolness, was wounded from a flying splinter. The search having been accomplished, Barren wrote a note to Humphreys, saying that he considered the Chesapeake was now the Englishman's prize, and that he was ready to deliver her up; but the latter replied that he had executed the orders of the commander-in-chief, that he was merely to obtain the deserters, was now to rejoin his squadron, and lamented sincerely the necessity which had compelled him to resort to violent measures. When the Chesapeake reached port, battered and blood-stained, a cry of indignation was raised throughout the union; the attack by the Leopard was felt to be an outrage upon the honour of the nation, and an insult that could only be wiped out by war. Promptly President Jefferson issued a proclamation requiring all armed vessels bearing commissions under the government of Great Britain, then within the harbours or waters of the United States, immediately to depart therefrom, and interdicting the entrance of any British ship armed or mercantile to American ports or waters. The act of the Leopard was disowned by the British government; captain Humphreys was recalled, and admiral Berkley superseded; but all this could not atone for the outrage, and five years later the dreary wrangle culminated in a declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain.

If then, American statesmen reasoned, the outrage perpetrated by the Leopard was held to be a casus belli by this country, why should not the act of the San Jacinto be similarly regarded by the British government now? President Lincoln promptly made up his mind that the act of captain Wilkes could not be sustained, and that the southern commissioners should be given up. "This," said he, "is the very thing the British captains used to do. They claimed the right of searching American ships, and carrying men out of them. That was the cause of the war of 1812. Now, we cannot abandon our principles. We shall have to give these men up and apologize for what we have done." In answer, therefore, to one of Lord John Russell's usually long and sonorous dispatches, demanding the surrender of the commissioners taken from the Trent, Mr. Seward, who also delighted in writing lengthy and pompous state-documents, went on to declare that his government could not find a justification for the proceeding of captain Wilkes, and that the only excuse at all that could be offered for his act was that he was strictly following British precedents. "It will be seen," he added, "that this government cannot deny the justice of the claim presented to us, in this respect, upon its merits. We are asked to do to the British nation what we have always insisted all nations ought to do unto us." Therefore, as we have already seen, the prisoners were on the 1st day of January, 1862, "cheerfully liberated." Thus ended the affair of the Trent; and now began the dispute about the Alabama.

On the outbreak of the war between the South and the North, Mr. Lincoln proclaimed a blockade of the Southern ports. English authorities point out that this was a breach of constitutional usage. The law, it is true, on the subject of blockades is plain. A government may proclaim a blockade of the ports of an enemy, but it can only, for the general purposes of war, order a closure of its own ports. The declaration of President Lincoln was therefore regarded by foreign governments as a recognition, by the North, of the Southern confederacy as a belligerent power; and upon this ground Lord Palmerston's ministry sought to defend its imprudent and hasty proclamation. The Northern government might have ordered the closure of its ports, but such a decree would be binding only under municipal law, and every port would be at the mercy of adventurous blockade-runners, who need only escape the harbour defences, as they could not be dealt with by United States war-vessels beyond American waters. The American government chose the blockade as the most expedient course, regardless of the technical standing it would give to the rebellious states; and it is difficult to understand how the adoption of a new form of war etiquette could change the character of a body of citizens in revolt against the supreme authority of the state. The truth of the matter is that whoever drew up the international clause relating to blockades, like the framers of many other laws, failed to foresee all the cases that might arise to be affected by the ordinance. The cases sought to be met were those where war is declared between separate nations, no inspiration-gleam being shed from the future to show that a day might come when thirty-one millions of people, scattered over half the New World, would separate into two mighty bodies and rise in a fratricidal war.

But the attitude of the imperial ministry in issuing its proclamation, commanding all British subjects to maintain a neutrality during the "war" between the United States and her rebellious citizens, was not the only affront at which the republicans took offence. Open sympathy was manifested for the South throughout Great Britain, and when news of the defeat of the raw levies by the discipline of the rebel soldiers at Bull Run reached England, there was much jubilation; and Lord Palmerston so far forgot his dignity and his duty as to make sneering allusions, during a public speech, to the "unfortunate rapid movements" of northern soldiers during that battle. This contemptuous phrase, coming from the head of the British ministry, embittered public feeling in the republic, towards England and all that belonged to her. Not many months elapsed before there arose a cause to intensify that feeling, and lead Great Britain and the United States to the verge of war.

One June morning, in 1861, the Savannah, a swift-sailing and audacious little vessel, escaped from Charleston, and began to scour the seas in search of northern merchant-vessels. Many a ship deep-laden with merchandise, pursuing her way from port to port, was met by this little scourge, plundered, and given to destruction. Fired by the example and the successes of the Savannah, other daring spirits in the South rigged out fleet-sailing vessels, armed them with guns, and took up the privateering trade. Among these were the Sumter, commanded by Captain Semmes, whose exploits at a later time made him famous; the Nashville and the Petrel, the latter skimming, like the bird whence she took her name, over the sea, and sweeping down upon her victim. But these were small vessels of light armament, and took flight the moment a ship of war was sighted by the sailor in the cross-trees. The first of the privateers that became really formidable was the Oreto, afterwards known as the Florida. She had not been long upon the seas when a shudder went through the northern merchant marine at the mention of her name. She was a swift sailer, and swooped down like an eagle upon her prey. Before she had been three months cruising, she captured fifteen vessels, thirteen of which she burned; and many a vessel sailing in northern waters or crossing the Atlantic, shuddered as she saw at night a tower of flame rising from the sea.

The Florida was a sturdy ship, heavily armed, and was not so fleet a sailer as some of her smaller sisters. She was built at Birkenhead, England, nominally for the Italian government; but the American minister resident at London, learned her destiny, and requested the British government to prevent her putting to sea. While the cabinet was giving "due consideration" to the request, the Florida passed out the Mersey upon her career. From the time this vessel departed, England was declared by American writers to be the "naval base of the confederacy."

But the most noted of all the privateers, the vessel which became the occasion of a new code of laws between nations, and brought the States and Great Britain to the verge of war, the reader need not be told, was the Alabama. This craft was built in Birkenhead by the Messrs. Laird, one of the most prominent building firms in the country. When on the stocks the vessel was called the "290," and crowds thronged to the dock-yard to see the ship destined for some strange mission. Long before she was built, the mystery was dissipated: the newspapers declared that she was intended as a southern cruiser, that she would sweep northern commerce from the seas, and be so armed as to be able to hold her own against even the heaviest ships of war. Mr. Adams, a descendant of a brilliant family, distinguished for their superior statesmanship and high sense of honour, was then the American representative in London. Promptly he sat down, on hearing of the character of this new ship, and wrote to Lord John Russell, urging him to institute enquiries into the allegations concerning the proposed mission of the vessel, and maintaining that it was the duty of the British government, on being satisfied that the craft was to be employed as a southern cruiser, to prevent her departure from England. Lord John Russell, in whom more than any other modern English statesman of note, much littleness was mingled with not a little greatness, sought to parry Adams' contentions by asking for proof of the allegations offered in one breath, and in the next expressing a doubt whether the government could fly in the face of a domestic law. Mr. Adams again pressed his request. He only desired that the government should satisfy itself as to the mission for which "290" was intended. If the mission were ascertained to be that which he had alleged, then he contended, under the "Foreign Enlistment Act," the vessel ought to be detained. Lengthy correspondence passed between the two ministers, in which Mr. Adams always maintained a calm dignity and an overwhelming logic, while Lord John Russell more than once gave way to petulance, and sought to defend his position by feeble and trifling analogies which he affected to find in American diplomacy. Meanwhile Mr. Laird went on building the ship, and as the time of her departure approached, Mr. Adams pressed Lord Russell with much earnestness to interpose his authority. At last Lord John was prevailed upon to ask the Queen's advocate* for advice; but when the request was made that official was sick, and could not return an answer. At last the answer came, expressing the opinion that the vessel ought to be detained. But while the ministers were waiting for the advocate's reply, "290" though unfinished, was made ready for sea, and, under pretence of a trial trip, sailed down the Mersey to Moelfra Bay where the work remaining was hastily completed. On the 31st of July, orders came from the British ministry to seize the vessel, but on the same day the prospective privateer, amid the ringing cheers of her crew, sailed away from the coast of England. Thence she proceeded to Terceira, one of the Western Islands, where she tarried till the arrival of the Agrippina from London, with her guns and stores, and the Bahama with captain Semmes, late commander of the Sumter, his officers and crew. On the 24th of August, the privateer was equipped and ready for her career of destruction. She was a screw steam sloop of 1,040 tons, built of wood, and for speed rather than strength. She was barque-rigged, had a crew of eighty men, and carried eight 32-pounders. When ready for sea, captain Semmes appeared on deck in Confederate uniform, and read his commission to the men. Henceforth he told them they would know their ship by the name of the Alabama; after which he delivered a speech predicting that their good fortune in escaping from England was an omen of their success among the shipping of the north. Then under pressure of steam and canvas, the saucy privateer steered for the scene of her future labours. On the 5th of September, when four days at sea, she sighted a brigantine under full canvas, bowling along, bound for a northern port. "Give him the British bunting," said captain Semmes, and the Union-Jack was flung out from the main-top. The brigantine tarried till the pompous stranger came up, and was making ready to hail, when a deluge of grape-shot came whistling across his bows; and looking, he saw the stranger flaunting the Southern flag. An hour later, the stately brig was a mass of flame through the twilight of the autumn sea. For the next eleven days, the Alabama lingered about where she met her first victim, and in that time captured and burnt property the value of which exceeded her own cost. Several fast-sailing cruisers, heavily armed, put out from Northern ports searching for "the pirate Semmes," but when a speck appeared upon the horizon that the look-out declared to be formidable, the privateer altered her course, and skimmed fleetly over the sea, leaving her pursuers far behind. A few months later, she hovered along the track of commerce between Aspinwall and New York, and after patient watching, one morning, captured the Ariel mail steamer, with 140 marines, a number of United States officers, and about 500 passengers. These the captain of the privateer decided to put on shore at Kingston, Jamaica, but the city was a pent-house of yellow fever. On board his own ship there was not room for their accommodation; so with much regret he let the steamer go, taking a bond for a large sum, payable when the war was ended. Some days later the look-out saw an American gun-boat, which afterwards proved to be the Hatteras, bearing down. Semmes smiled grimly as he ordered the decks to be cleared for action, and saw the war-ship approaching, eager for the fray. It was a short conflict. After a few broadsides the Hatteras went down, and the privateer, issuing unscathed from the encounter, pursued her way. The name of the Alabama now became one of terror and hate, and few vessels ventured from their ports while it was known that she was near their track. The American government equipped a number of heavily-armed and speedy cruisers, which scoured the seas in search of the marauder; and several narrow escapes told Semmes that Northern waters were no longer safe. So he set sail for the Cape of Good Hope, and preyed upon all the Northern merchant vessels (which were not many) that he met there; but soon finding that the merchant shipping of the enemy was beginning to forsake the seas, he sailed for Europe, and put into Cherbourg to repair his vessel, now much battered, and no longer unrivalled for her speed. Bitter reproaches followed the captain of the privateer, and he was burning for an opportunity to distinguish himself by some valorous deed. During his career he had captured sixty-five vessels, and destroyed property valued at over four millions of dollars; yet his repute was that of a buccaneer that preyed upon defenceless vessels, but who fled on being confronted with a strength equal to his own. The Hatteras, which he had met and sunk with a half-dozen broadsides, was represented as a crazy old hulk not fit to be at sea, and that must have foundered from the concussion of her own guns. But Semmes was a daring and brilliant sailor, who knew not fear, as he was soon but to prove too plainly. He writhed under the abuse heaped upon him, and was stung by the palpable truth, that, whether he were coward or courageous, his warfare had been upon defenceless commerce, and that however much he may have harassed his foes, no glory waited on his career. While the Alabama lay in Cherbourg, the American war-vessel Kearsage arrived off the coast of France, and, learning where the privateer lay, made several demonstrations in the offing, which the Alabama regarded as a challenge to battle. Half reckless and half hopeful, Semmes made up his mind to accept the challenge of the haughty man-of-war, and notified the United States consul of his intention. He made ready his ship, and, on a fine Sunday morning, 19th of June, 1864, steamed out of the harbour, to engage in the murderous conflict. The inhabitants of the city crowded upon every height to witness the battle. To the inexperienced eye the two ships, now quietly nearing each other, were of about equal strength, and even captain Semmes, though at one time one of the most experienced officers of the Northern naval service, was deceived. He did not know that the ship advancing for the fray was in all respects superior to the Alabama. It was only when it was all ended he learnt that her armament was superior to his own, her crew larger, and that she was iron-clad amidships. The battle was begun without delay, and soon was over. The Kearsage possessing greater speed than her adversary, was able to keep up a distance of about 500 yards, at which range she was little affected by the Alabama's shot; while the latter was suffering terribly. The issue was decided in less than an hour. Captain Semmes, finding his vessel sinking, struck his flag; but before the enemy could come to the rescue, the noted privateer went down. Some of the crew were picked up by the Kearsage's boats, and captain Semmes and others were rescued by an English yacht, the Deerhound. There was a deep feeling of relief through the merchant marine of the North when the end of the Alabama was known; and captain Winslow, with superior guns and armoured sides, was the lion of the hour.

Before the destruction of the privateer, there was much diplomatic turmoil between the British and United States governments, the latter holding the former responsible for the damages done by the Alabama. Once again Lord John Russell fancied he had terminated a difficulty by becoming peremptory; but his successor to the colonial office, Lord Stanley—now Lord Derby—frankly conceded the grounds taken by Mr. Adams in the discussion with Lord John, to which we have already reverted. The outcome was renewed negotiations, a good deal of diplomatic fire, which, as is usual in such controversy, was confined to the glow of anthracite coal. The United States declared, that, while the British government had not ordered and sanctioned England's making war on American commerce, it had permitted the outrage, and was, now, in honour, and by all the rules of national etiquette, bound to make reparation.

At length, when correspondence failed to procure satisfaction, an arbitration was proposed, which consisted of representatives of England, the United States, the president of the Swiss Confederation, and the emperor of Brazil. This tribunal met in Geneva, and on the 15th of September, 1872, delivered its final award. For the wrong-headedness of Lord Russell and the ministry it was decreed that England should pay a sum of £3,229,166 13s. 4d. The only regret that one can feel on reading this record of retributive justice, is, that the statesmen, who, by their obstinate prejudice, instead of the public who were the victims, were not obliged to pay the fine. Some Englishmen, among whom were many of those who clapped their hands and threw slippers laden with rice after the Alabama, as she slipped down the Mersey, on her career of pillage, muttered "curses not loud but deep" when they were obliged to pay $15,000,000 for their Southern sympathy. Several leading Englishmen, and Sir Alexander Cockburn, an eminent judge—if eminence can afford to ignore such codes as national obligation and national honour—affirmed that the Geneva decision was unjust, and advised its repudiation. But the amount was paid, and the British taxpayer has had an opportunity to realize how dangerous a possession national sympathy may sometimes be, and to lay to heart this costly lesson which Mr. Kingsley ought to have had an opportunity of stating by the mouth of Mrs. Bedonebyasyoudid.

It has been already seen that Canada dutifully reflected the Southern sympathy of her mother, and aggravated the feeling of hostility against the British empire in the republic. Southern refugees were received here with open arms, were sometimes publicly fêted, and all the while given to understand that they were regarded as the noble sufferers in a glorious cause. During the summer of 1864 a body of the refugees decided to turn Canadian sympathy to account, and, in September, sallied forth from their colonial asylum and captured and plundered two American vessels plying on Lakes Erie and Ontario. Elated by their success, the filibusters, a few weeks later, headed by an ex-Confederate soldier named Young, burst into St. Alban's, a little town in Vermont, and situated near the frontier, where they plundered three of the local banks, shot one of the cashiers, bearing away to Canada $233,000 worth of booty. The Canadian government now aroused itself and distributed volunteers along our frontier, to prevent any further breach of the neutrality law. The filibusters were arrested at the instance of the United States government, who demanded their extradition. They were tried in Montreal, but discharged by Judge Coursol, before whom they were examined, on a technical ground. A sum of $90,000 was found on the raiders when arrested, but on their discharge the money was refunded them. The act fed our prejudice for the time, but, in due season, we had to repay the amount to the American government. There is no one who will say that this did not serve us right.

On the 15th of April, 1865, in the evening, president Abraham Lincoln, who had two years before proclaimed the freedom of slaves in the rebel States, while sitting in his box at the theatre, was shot dead by the hand of an assassin. The civilized world stood aghast at the intelligence of the deed, and Canada showed a heartfelt sympathy for the untimely end of this great friend of liberty. Meetings were held in the cities, at which resolutions were passed expressing the sorrow of our people; flags floated at half-mast, and bells tolled from a hundred steeples.

The minds of the timorous were disturbed in Canada, during the same year, by the rumours, ever on the wing, of a contemplated invasion by some of the turbulent spirits who had been taught the trade of war during the American rebellion. Somewhere near Union Square, in New York, a band of men known as the "Fenian Brotherhood" met to discuss measures for the liberation of Ireland. The name Fenian had an historic ring, and fired the hearts of those who longed to see the green flag float again on the hill of Tara. The Fenians, it came to be remembered, were an old-time Irish militia, burly kerns who went in bare arms, and "would dare death and the devil." Money and recruits poured in to the "head-centre" at New York; a thorough organization was effected, and the brotherhood held meetings at which, in grim earnest, they discussed the plan of "liberating Ireland." Amongst this deluded band were many noble and patriotic spirits,* whatever unjust and intemperate writers may affirm, and some again of the most worthless and mischievous adventurers that ever disgraced society. Demagogues who had never figured in any more heroic movement than a drunken row in some bar-room in the Sixth Ward, vapoured against "the bloody Saxon," and thrilled the deluded crowds of their fellow Irishmen by recounting the means they would pursue to overthrow British rule, and set "darlin' ould Ireland free agin." Some of the most useless and vicious loafers found in the agitation a golden trade, and pushed themselves to the front as leaders. "The contributions given by some Irish hack-drivers and servant girls, in the sincere belief that they were helping to man the ranks of an Irish army of independence, enabled some of the self-appointed leaders to wear fine clothes and order expensive dinners." The organization grew, and gigantic projects were developed. One of these was a conquest of Canada as a first step "before takin' Ireland."

Early in the year 1866, it was resolved, at a meeting of the brotherhood, to celebrate St. Patrick's Day by seizing New Brunswick; and sure enough when that festival came, with it appeared, on the boundary of the coveted province, a band of Hibernians, armed in grotesque fashion, and bedecked with shamrocks, looking more like a detachment bound for Doneybrook fair than invaders thirsty for conquest. The visitors were met by Colonel Cole and a body of volunteers, and speedily took to flight, winding up the day after they had got beyond the reach of Canadian bullets, with a whisky feast.* On the night of May 31st, following, a bolder attempt was made. An advance guard consisting of about 900 of the brotherhood, under the command of one O'Neil, in the night, crossed Niagara river, and landed about a mile below the village of Fort Erie. They advanced with much spirit into the village, where they demanded rations, and vainly sought the co-operation of the inhabitants. Then they tore up a piece of the Grand Trunk railway-track, cut the telegraph wires, set fire to some bridges, and, in all other ways of destruction, endeavoured to deport themselves in the manner of invading warriors. During the forenoon of the following day, the American gun-boat

* In connection with the Fenian attempt on New Brunswick, Mr. Edward Jack, of Fredericton, New Brunswick, furnishes the writer with the following facts:—
“ Sir A. J. Smith, prior to the Fenian invasion, interviewed Andrew Johnson, president of the United States, who promised him, that so soon as the Fenians committed an overt act he would attend to them. When the mauraunders made their appearance at Eastport, in the State of Maine, the United States government despatched several vessels of war to prevent their making a demonstration on New Brunswick. Not far from Eastport might be seen one of the fleetest war-vessels in the United States service, lying at anchor with steam up, while not far distant a British frigate in provincial waters was ready for the fray. The Fenians spent their money freely at Eastport in liquor and cigars, and did no harm beyond burning a building on Indian Island, opposite Eastport. A party of the Fenians ascended the Ste. Croix to Calais, where some of the number, who put up at the Frontice hotel, stole all the soap, and other things they could lay their hands on in the rooms, on their departure. The arrival of the adventurers at Calais was followed promptly by that of a body of German artillerymen, in the pay of the United States. These were intended to be a check on the Fenian operations on the American side. These artillery-men used to visit the British side, and indulge so freely in beer, that the provincialists, who feared an attack from the Irish myrmidons, placed them in drays and had them carted across the river to the American side. Some of the best people of St. Stephen, were so alarmed at the appearance of the Fenians, that they sent their plate to the Calais bank for safe keeping. From the quiet little town of Saint Andrew's, situated at the mouth of the Ste. Croix, not far from the island where De Monts and Champlain spent their first winter in America, the Fenians could be seen drilling to the number of a dozen or two. Fort Tipperary, which overlooks the town, was promptly garrisoned, and the old honeycombed guns which the rotten carriages could hardly support, were placed in position. He would have been a bold man who fired them! In the midst of the trepidation a British frigate steamed up to Joe's Point, at the northern end of the town, where she quietly cast anchor. The commanding officer came ashore, and consoled the inhabitants by telling them not to fear. 'If the Fenians get in here,' he said, 'clear away as fast as you can, for we shall shell the city and burn it over the rascals' heads.' ”

Michigan began to patrol the river to prevent any breaches of the neutrality laws; and shut her eyes whenever a boat with reinforcement or stores for O'Neil happened to be crossing from the American shore. When news of the invasion, by this rabble, reached the public, there was a general feeling of indignation. There was some chagrin felt that the military defences of the country were in a disordered condition, but not a moment was lost in taking all possible measures to hurl back the intruders. The regulars in the Hamilton and Toronto districts were at once ordered by Major-General Napier to the Niagara peninsula. Orders were given to call out the volunteers, who seemed enthusiastic to enter the fray. Lieutenant-Colonel Dennis mustered six hundred of the Toronto force, which number was, in a large measure, supplied by Major Gillmor of the Queen's Own. These, with the 13th Battalion, of Hamilton, and other volunteer companies, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Booker, were despatched to Port Colborne to protect the Welland Canal. Colonel George Peacocke, of the 16th regiment, commanded the entire expedition, and accompanied the regulars to Chippewa, where he was joined by the Governor-General's body guard and other forces. Arrived at Chippewa Colonel Peacocke dispatched Captain Akers with instructions to the officer commanding at Port Colborne to effect a junction of his troops with those of Peacocke's, the following forenoon, about ten or eleven o'clock, at Stevensville, a village a short distance to the north-west of Fort Erie. Peacocke was a brave and capable officer, but he was criminally ignorant of the frontier topography, and, under such circumstances, should not have been given (or rather taken) command. Had he put himself entirely in the hands of such of his subordinates as were acquainted with the campaign ground, he might have earned excuse; but his conduct seems to have been a mixture of self-reliance and dependence, of confessed ignorance, and unbending arrogance. He was not able to instruct Akers, who was "as much in the woods" as himself, as to what route of march the volunteers ought to take, and left Booker to decide that for himself. Akers reached Port Colborne, at 2 o'clock in the morning, and delivered his orders. Meanwhile information had been received at Port Colborne, which, the volunteer officers, there, believed, altered the complexion of the whole case, and justified a departure from Peacocke's plan. It was learnt that the Fenian force at Fort Erie was much smaller than was at first supposed, that the marauders were in a state of wretched discipline, had done nought but carouse since landing, and could be expelled by the prompt movements of a moderate force. It was therefore agreed that Booker with his troops should start by rail in time to reach Fort Erie by eight o'clock in the morning, and that Lieutenant-Colonel Dennis and Akers should embark with a company of artillery, at Port Colborne, and proceed to reconnoitre along Niagara river, returning to co-operate with Booker at eight o'clock. If Peacocke should agree to this plan, he was informed that he might march by the river road from Chippewa, making a combined attack with Colonel Booker at some point "between Fort Erie and Black Creek, cutting off the enemy's retreat by the river—the tug to be employed in cruising up and down the river, cutting off any boats that might attempt to escape, and communicating between the forces advancing from Chippewa and from Fort Erie." Dennis and Akers did not wait for Peacocke's reply, but started at four o'clock in the morning on the tug Robb, taking with them the Welland Garrison Battery, and a portion of the Dunnville Naval Brigade. Shortly after the departure of the tug, came a telegram, as might have been expected, from Colonel Peacocke, saying he disapproved of the modifications proposed and would adhere to his original plan. The question was no longer one of expediency but of etiquette, and Booker resolved to fulfil, as far as possible, the instructions of the benighted commander. So about an hour after the departure of the Robb he put his men on board the train and proceeded as far as Ridgeway, whence the troops left the cars and marched towards Stevensville. That same morning O'Neil had begun a movement westward, with the intention of destroying the locks of the Welland Canal, and Colonel Booker, about two miles from Ridgeway, came up with the marauders' out-posts. Not expecting such a meeting he held a hurried consultation with Major Gillmor, of the Queen's Own, when an attack was resolved on, both officers believing Colonel Peacocke and his regulars could not be far away. When the word was given, the volunteers advanced with much spirit, and fairly turned back, for some distance, the enemy's lines; and on-lookers must have believed, for a time, that the day was to be with these raw levies, composed mostly of clerks and collegiates. While the brave young volunteers were grappling with O'Neil's Fenians, an orderly came up and put in Booker's hand a message from Colonel Peacocke. A shade passed over the face of the officer as he read the note. It was directed to him at Port Colborne, instructing him to delay his departure from that point two hours beyond the hour previously specified, as Colonel Peacocke could not be ready to start with his regulars from Chippewa as early as had been expected. Booker, it has been seen, had really departed an hour before the prescribed time, which would change Peacocke's calculations by three hours; so that he now saw there was no assistance for the young fellows so far outnumbered by the brawny-armed followers of O'Neil. While the volunteers struggled with the outnumbering enemy, a report reached Booker that a body of Fenian cavalry was advancing, and was close at hand. At once, and by Booker's orders, Gillmor formed his men in square to receive the onset; but the report proved to be a ruse. The manœuvre was a fatal one for the devoted volunteers, who, in consequence, became a conspicuous mark for the Fenians' bullets. When Gillmor saw the error, he at once endeavoured to extend his men, but the fire was so severe that the rear companies fell back and could not be reformed; and the order was given to retire. In a few minutes the volunteers, who, against overwhelming odds, had "fought so well," were in full retreat, O'Neil's wild myrmidons in mad pursuit. The loss of the Canadians was one officer and eight men killed, and six officers and twenty-six men wounded. What was the loss of the Fenians has not since been known, though it is believed not to have been less than ours. The campaign so far had been a series of blunders. Aker and Dennis should not have gone upon the reconnoitering tour without having heard the reply of the commanding officer; Peacocke, should, in the first instance, have seen his way clear to be able to start at the hour he fixed for departure before communicating the time to his brother officers; and secondly, should not have trusted the fate of the expedition to the chance of an orderly overtaking Booker before leaving Port Colborne; while it may be that he was the most culpable of all in taking a command for which he was not competent, through ignorance of the ground upon which his forces were to operate, or, feeling this deficiency, in refusing to take counsel of those, who, if they knew less than himself of tactics, knew more of geography. We hope, should it ever be our lot again to see hostile steel in our Dominion, that we shall not be found putting our trust in officers who know nothing about our frontier, and who will learn nothing till the lives of a number of our sons shall have been sacrificed to their ignorance. These eight brave young fellows and their officer who fell, and the tarnish of defeat on their surviving comrades, were a tribute to official etiquette—the price we paid to military incapacity.

The remainder may as well be told. Dennis and Akers landed at the appointed time at Fort Erie, and picked up about sixty stragglers, comprising "Liberators" and camp followers. O'Neil hearing that the regulars were on the march from Chippewa, retreated on Fort Erie, reconquering the village; and when night fell, silently made his way across the river for the sheltering American shore. Before he could disembark he was arrested, with his followers, by United States authorities. On Sunday morning, eager for war, Peacocke and his troops arrived at Fort Erie, but nought of the enemy remained save the embers of their camp fires, and a number of broken whiskey bottles. A few stragglers who had been carousing around the neighbourhood while their comrades were embarking, were afterwards captured by the regulars with much alacrity, put on board a tug, taken to Toronto, and lodged in jail. They were subsequently tried under a statute passed during the Canadian rebellion. Some were discharged for want of evidence, others were found guilty and sentenced to death, but the punishment was commuted to imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Several other demonstrations of invasion were made, some weeks later, by the brotherhood. A large body gathered at Ogdensburg, their eyes turned to the Dominion capital, but the massing of troops on the Canadian side, and the patrolling of the St. Lawrence by a British gun-boat, damped their ambition. Another horde gathered opposite Cornwall, but dispersed before the display of a volunteer force. Still another body of the liberators, 1,800 strong, made a dash across the border from St. Alban's, Vermont, but were driven back in hot haste by our troops. On reaching Vermont again the ringleaders of the filibusters were arrested for a breach of the neutrality laws, and thrown into prison; and the president issued a proclamation ordering government officials to use every means to repress further attacks on Canada from American territory. When the excitement was ended, the people of Canada did not forget to pay tribute to the memory of those who fell in resisting the invaders. In the Queen's Park, Toronto, a monument was raised which tells the story of the brave young hearts who died in defending their homes.

der small provocation, and for holding, not unfrequently, in contempt men the latchet of whose shoes he was not worthy to loose. Yet we have seen that he was successful. He had an unbounded ambition, a profusion of nervous force, an unflagging perseverance, an activity as restless as the winds of heaven; and, to crown these invincible tools in the hands of a man who sets excelsior for his motto, he had an aggressiveness that pushed aside obstacles and all opposing pretensions, and a capacity for organization that always astonished and sometimes bewildered those who are not given to analysis, but who are charmed by flash. No political leader could ignore M. Cartier, for he would prefer being matched against half a dozen strong men, to feeling that he had arrayed against him a tireless energy that never slept, never paused, that drilled on, and would work its way through iron walls till it reached its ends.

Alexander Tilloch Galt, the chief of finance in the new ministry, the son of John Galt, a writer of some note, and the friend and biographer of Lord Byron; was born at Chelsea, London, on the 6th of September, 1817. Fired by the successes of his father, he showed an early taste for literature, and when in his fourteenth year contributed to Fraser's Magazine. A writer in the Illustrated London News refers, with much approval, to this early contribution; but we can only shed compassion backward through the years upon the editor of Fraser's Magazine. It is a sore task enough for a magazine editor to have to read, and reject the tomes of manuscript produced by adults, but it is horror opening her flood-gates upon his head when he is not safe from boys of fourteen. Therefore, we must not be regarded as considering that either the spirit which prompted Mr. Galt to write at fourteen, or the matter he wrote, was good; we do not approve of the parent who permitted him to write; neither does the judgment of the editor commend itself to us, who published the lad's effusion. Literature after a short stay with young Galt waved her wing; and the young man fixed his eye upon some other star. The

Galt family emigrated to Canada, in 1824, and when Alexander had attained his sixteenth year, he entered the service of the British American Land Company, in the eastern townships, as a junior clerk. His marked abilities brought him to notice, and his rise through the various stages of the department was rapid, till he reached the post of commissionership. "During his twelve years management," says a reliable authority, "the company was changed from one of almost hopeless insolvency, to that of a valuable and remunerative undertaking." Mr. Galt first entered parliament when the country was afflame over the rebellion losses bill, but at this period he seemed to be less useful as a politician than as a business man. He endeavoured to distinguish himself as a shining protestant by opposition to catholicity, though the true way for him to prove the superiority of his protestantism, was to worship God in his church in a simple earnest spirit, and when he left the temple to do unto others as he would have others do unto him. Uncharitableness and intolerance are not any more true protestantism, than catholicism is the drunken zeal of those brutal mobs that stood up in defence of the "church," when Gavazzi lectured in Quebec and Montreal. In the lapse of time, Mr. Galt outgrew weak prejudice, and he was for many years regarded as being "too judicial" for the warped ways of the politician. He was a valuable member when measures were supported or opposed merely for party's sake, and sat as one alone in the house, now warmly supporting a view of the government, and again appearing the most censorious among the opposition. From the first his opinion on all questions of trade and finance commanded the close attention of the house. Upon the collapse of the Brown-Dorion ministry, he was requested to form an administration, but having practically alienated himself from party, he had no following in the house, and not being possessed of the lofty ambition of George Brown, wisely refused to attempt a task which must have ended in failure. We have already noted other events in his career, and shall see him again before we close. Mr. Galt, though not born in Canada, is a Canadian, and even with his eccentricities is a credit to his country. His political compass as our readers are aware, has frequently taken fits of wide variation; to intensify the figure a little his opinion has gone round the compass. He has shown decided leanings to the policy of the reformers; and at times has sounded notes with the true ring of the conservative. This perhaps Mr. Galt himself would call the swinging of the pendulum, denoting a well-balanced non-party man; but unfortunately the time came when the pendulum, reaching one side, remained there. For example, Mr. Galt was a zealous champion of confederation, and we write it down, with a hearty feeling, to his credit. At another period of his life he was something quite different. A band of men gathered together in Canada shortly after the tory mob had burnt the parliament buildings in Montreal, and circulated a manifesto recommending "a friendly and peaceful separation from British connexion, and a union upon equitable terms with the great North American confederacy of sovereign states." A number of gentlemen of good standing in Canada, supported the scheme, and one of these was Mr. A. T. Galt. There would be nothing striking in this historical morsel but that, a few months ago, while trying to restrain her laughter, Canada stood watching the same Mr. A. T. Galt, as Canadian high commissioner to England, endeavouring to set flying no less a kite than a scheme for the federation of the empire. The idea, unfortunately for the fame of Mr. Galt, is not original, and even in the way of second-hand is only a half-way measure. For, in Locksley Hall, Tennyson has a much better proposal, as we learn when he sings of the time

"When the war drum throbs no longer, and the battle-flags are furled
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

But as the Canadians are not far enough advanced yet to appreciate such an admirable scheme as this, Mr. Galt should have brought the project out in a story-book rather than in a practical way. Had Jules Verne proposed all those elaborate ideas of his to the French government, he might not have succeeded either, but he wisely instead put them forth in his "Ten Thousand Leagues under the Sea," his voyage through the heavens, and other unusual excursions. Should it ever occur to Mr. Galt that his federation plan might be extended so as to take in the moon, we beseech of him not to make the proposal in the formal way either to the British or the Canadian government—as so surely as he does they will not take kindly to the scheme—but simply bring it out in a novel. If we except this one marvellous idea, so far as relates to Mr. Galt's public career, his influence upon political life in Canada has been for the better, and he deserves well of his countrymen. As his mission at the court of St. James has, by his own desire, been brought to a close, and he is again to become a resident of Canada, we only express the wish, that must be general, that the country may for many years to come have the benefit of his experience, prudence and great ability in public matters. We beseech of him, from our own feeling, and on behalf of Canadians, however, to purge his mind of this federation phantasm.

Perhaps one of the most prominent men in the new ministry was M. Hector L. Langevin, secretary of state for Canada. M. Langevin is a son of the late Jean Langevin, who was assistant civil secretary under Lords Gosford and Sydenham. He was born in the city of Quebec on the 25th of August, 1826. Educated in the city of his birth he began the study of law in the office of Hon. A. N. Morin, concluding his course with the late Sir George E. Cartier. He was called to the bar in 1850. Early in life M. Langevin gave evidence of the first-rate abilities which were to be employed in the service of his country in later years. In connexion with the practice of his profession he was at various periods the editor of three different newspapers, of the Melanges Religieux, and the Journal d'Agriculture, in Montreal; and of the Courrier du Canada, in Quebec. He had the desire common to so many aspiring young men in this country to enter political life, and began his public career in the capacity of mayor of Quebec, to which office he was several times elected. In 1855, he took the first of three prizes for an essay on Canada, written for circulation in Paris, in which paper as in his other contributions he gave promise of reaching high literary eminence, though, somewhat unfortunately for letters, the public charmer, with her siren tongue, won him for her own. He made his first appearance in parliament, the reader remembers, in 1857, when he was elected for Dorchester. Through the many years that followed till death removed M. Cartier from the scenes, M. Langevin acted the part of a loyal, and skilful second, in his party, though the eye of Lower Canada lit not with enthusiasm save when it fell upon the imposing figure of the principal. Yet to us, M. Langevin in the role of second to M. Cartier, seems like the sun acting satellite to the moon. As a statesman, to M. Cartier we can only accord a second place; to M. Langevin we give a first. If no tempest come, it is impossible for one to "ride the whirlwind and direct the storm." Yet, we may from observing the man in the calm judge of his capacity in the hour of tumult. M. Langevin has been described by some critics as a narrow bigot, caring only for the welfare of his own race, and grudging and opposing the progress of his English brethren. We are glad to say that these are the accusations of persons who know not M. Langevin, and who perhaps cared not to know him since their object was only to blacken. Most assuredly is the French leader loyal to the race whence he has sprung: there has never arisen in his province a man to whom the best interests of French Canadians is more dear, or who in advancing those interests has ever displayed more earnestness, wisdom and ability. But, above all things, we believe he is a Canadian. Indeed, what we want in our public men is patriotism, to keep our political system from the mire into which it shows a tendency to fall. When the Acadians of New Brunswick sent a delegation to him reverting to the time that their ancestors were expelled from their happy homes in the Basin of Minas and to all the dark years that since have fallen upon the outcast descendant, M. Langevin pointed out to them that the past was now a sealed book, that the duty of the Acadian as well as of the French Canadian was not to keep alive the remembrance of these dark hours, but to feel that one and both, while doing well not to forget the language of their fathers, were above all things Canadians, enjoying equal privileges with other nationalities in the provinces. Of this nature has been his advice times without number to the people of his own province, and it is only just to say that, owing to his exertions, a more liberal spirit, a feeling of broader citizenship, has grown up among his people. We do not wish here to be understood as thinking that the province of Quebec has held a monopoly of uncharitableness; for a large portion of the people of Ontario, through the teaching of a press forced into perfidious work by the needs of party, regard Quebec with a feeling at once narrow and unworthy. Unfortunately, the Globe newspaper has been foremost in promoting the bad work of estrangement, though some do now hope, and we are of the number, that the worst of that great journal's work is done; that, to use the words of Bystander, "the black flag has been hauled down." Under these circumstances, the duty of Sir Hector Langevin to his province is resistance, but with more than judicious resistance, and a patriotic assertion of his people's rights, he is not to be charged. M. Langevin's ability as a statesman is, as we have said already, of the highest order. To a comprehensive understanding he brings a calm and unwarped judgment, while so ready is his grasp, and so accurate his view that he has more than once astonished delegations having complex propositions before government, by his readiness in unravelling and making plain the difficult sides of the question. To all who meet him in his public capacity he is painstaking and affable, and in every walk of life comports himself with that courtesy which he has acquired from his distinguished ancestors. In this respect we do wish some of his blustering, pompous colleagues, who endeavour to supply by airs what they lack in escutcheon, would try to emulate him. No one has ever yet proved that he is a gentleman, or "of good family" by the assumption of swagger; on the contrary, he thereby shows as plainly as if he had it written upon his front, that he is low born, and not a gentleman. Men have control over most of the events in their lives, but they have not the remotest influence upon their own birth; so that it would be unjust to think the worse of a man in exalted place that he is not high-born. A large number of our public men have sprung from humble parentage, and these we can readily forgive, when high upon fortune's steep, for endeavouring to appear as gentlemen; for they must take their wives and their daughters to Ottawa, and go to court, and give and receive calls, and hold a place in social life proper to their rank in the public sphere; and when such men deport themselves with that grace, courtesy and tolerance belonging to those who are to the manner born, they deserve to be ranked among those whose house has never been seen in the bud but always in the tree. But the person who, plebeian born, wraps himself in conceit and vulgar pomp, or in that brusque bonhomie which sits well upon some imperial colonel, and that the parvenu counterfeits only to travesty, is plebeian still; all the waters of the St. Lawrence will not make him whiter than the "great unwashed" of whom he is, but whom he despises. In 1881, with the approval of those who set no store on gauds or title, save as badges of merit, and of duty, in whatever line, well and faithfully done, her Majesty conferred upon M. Langevin the order of knighthood, which distinction is now his.

One of the most remarkable men in the council, was the minister of customs, Mr. S. L. Tilley. For many years he had been the foremost politician in New Brunswick, and, in the capacity of leader, exhibited talents of more than a common order. Unfortunately, the profession of politics to the popular mind, when placed in the moral scale, has little specific gravity; and the person who enters public life is regarded as having taken a step downward. But through all the years that Hon. Leonard Tilley had given to public duty, the most unscrupulous opponent never even sought to put any tarnish upon his name. So upright were all his acts, so deep and sincere his moral convictions, so able his administration of affairs, and, withal, so zealous was he in the service of his country, that his name was a very tower of strength to his party. Once indeed in the hubbub of political strife, the popular mind lost its balance and rejected the favourite, but when reason returned the people repaired their error, and placed him again in power. He was, as we have seen, a warm advocate of union, and it is not improbable that the confederation might not to this day have comprehended the maritime provinces, but for his firm and decided course at the critical time when New Brunswick was the pivot ground of the scheme. Mr. Tilley brought to the enlarged sphere of politics at Ottawa, a mind stored with the fruits of observation and experience, a penetrating and well-contained intellect, and an unerring judgment. As minister of customs, he was prompt and decisive, but he displayed such clearness of grasp and excellence of judgment upon every question of trade or finance which came up, that it was apparent he was capable of much higher work than playing the role of chief custom-house officer. An important occasion was soon to arise when the people of Canada demanded a reorganization of the laws bearing upon trade and commerce; and in Hon. Leonard Tilley was found a man equal to the emergency. We need not here do more than refer to the National Policy, and to the laurels that have fallen to Mr. Tilley's share through the success of that measure, which is indebted in so great a degree to his financial skill and keen insight. Among modern statesmen, we need not say the place of Hon. (now Sir) Leonard Tilley is among the first; and to this qualification he adds the other distinction of being an honest man. There are, perhaps, in the Canadian parliament more forcible speakers than Sir Leonard Tilley, but there is certainly not one more convincing; and the way to judge of the merit of a speech is by looking at the results. "The distinguishing characteristic of Sir Leonard Tilley," says Mr. Nicholas Flood Davin, in his sparkling and capital paper, "Great Speeches," in the Canadian Monthly, "is sincerity. No man could appear more lost in his subject. This is a great element in persuasiveness. The earnestness is enhanced by a style of pure Saxon and unaffected simplicity. His ease of expression would at once mark him out in the English house of commons, and the auctoritas with which he speaks, gives him weight and secures a following. He has the rare power of making a budget speech interesting, a power which no chancellor of the exchequer I ever heard in the English house of commons had, Mr. Gladstone, of course, always excepted." In listening to Sir Leonard Tilley, we hear a man who makes no statement that has not received thorough examination from every view, no opinion that does not bear the stamp of deep conviction; few, if any, propositions that those who follow will be able to disprove. The critic who admires sound and fury would be disappointed in Sir Leonard Tilley, for he would find a man discussing his question with calm, earnest dignity, never allowing passion to hurry him into extravagance, but firmly maintaining himself upon the ground of common sense. Through such simple, irresistible force, Mr. Cobden, whom Sir Leonard as a statesman and as a speaker strongly resembles, was in his day one of the leading orators in Great Britain, and one of the foremost of her public men. Sir Leonard Tilley's public career is one that some of our young politicians might study with profit. To no principle in private or political life to which he has pledged himself has he ever been known to prove faithless; and in, at least, one notable instance* the sincerity of his character is shown in strong

* Once upon a time a certain Christian who told from the steeple-top — we are not suggesting the Pharisee in the temple, though we cannot quarrel with the reader if contrast with that of another public man, a "shining light," a "vessel of election," and we know not what else, to one of our leading Christian churches. Sir Leonard is gracious and affable to all with whom his duty brings him in contact, and it would certainly be taxing to the patience of Job himself to have to listen to, expostulate with, and resist the shoals of delegations that visit Ottawa representing this, that and the other "interest," and with whom Sir Leonard, by virtue of his position as adjuster of the tariff law, is brought into contact. Once or twice he has hinted at withdrawal from public life, but his province, and Canada at large, will not willingly let retire from her service, so long as health remains, a son to whom one and both owe so much, and who has been, since his first appearance on the political scenes, down to this hour a credit to the country that has given him birth. A further popularity is added to Sir Leonard in the social sphere, by the grace and charming manners of his accomplished wife, Lady Tilley.

A member whose presence would be felt in any cabinet, was Hon. Peter Mitchell, minister of marine and fisheries, who had also been appointed to the senate. Mr. Mitchell had had a prominent political career in his native province, New Brunswick. He was a keen-eyed critic and a powerful assailant out of office, and an Armstrong gun in a ministry. Mr. George Stewart, jr., in some of his life-like portraits in "Canada under Duf-

he see a resemblance—how deep were his religious feelings, and who regarded the person that partook of intoxicants as unfit for society, was appointed to the governorship of New Brunswick, but the shock of the elevation upon his moral nature was so great that he fairly held wassail, though not caring for spirits himself, during his reign in government house. The case is altered now, he said, and I must bow to the custom of keeping spirits at my table and on my sideboard. Hon. Leonard Tilley succeeded this person as governor. He had never declared that moderate drinkers were outside the pale of society, but in an earnest, dignified manner had always striven to promote the cause of total abstinence. The provincials expected that he would surely follow the example of the more demonstrative teetotaler and Christian who had been his predecessor; but from the day he entered government house till his leaving, intoxicating spirits formed no part of his hospitalities. We may be pardoned for relating this fact, since the "enterprising journalist" has preceded us.

ferin” has this telling bit of description with reference to Mr. Mitchell. “In popularity he almost rivalled Sir John himself. He was a hard worker, a redoubtable foe and an unforgiving enemy. He was keen in debate, quick to perceive weakness in an opponent, and ready on the instant to strike him down. He always spoke eloquently and well. He was bold but did not always show the more subtle element of tact which he undoubtedly possessed. He was vindictive and never neglected to pursue an enemy with relentless fury. In executive power he had few equals. With great skill he mastered the minutiae of his office, and his department rapidly became one of the most important in the cabinet.” Politicians matching themselves against Mr. Mitchell, had usually come to grief. When a clear-headed man is able to outwit an opponent by calmly pondering the situation over, as the careful chess-player looks many moves into the future of his game, he is not unfrequently termed a trickster; and Mr. Mitchell who had been guilty of no offence save possessing the ability to delve a yard below the mines of some of those pitted against him, received the sobriquet of “Bismarck.” For a brief season many were persuaded that the clever politician dealt in naught but “treasons, stratagems and spoils;” and they heard without wonder that an invertebrate lieutenant-governor and a guileless ministry had fallen a victim to his wiles. As this is not a question of morals, we have only to say that if a ministry can not resist the arts and a governor the blandishments of one man, it were a pity the one should not fail and the other be perverted. There is in the record, even taking the distortions of the outwitted ones, little to bring a blush to Mr. Mitchell, and less that the historian needs to condemn or excuse. It need hardly be said that the department given to the charge of Mr. Mitchell was at this time the most important in the public service. With the energy and ability which are his in such a marked degree, he vigorously set to work to frame laws for the protection of the various fisheries, a task requiring a vast deal of consideration, prudence and skill ; and he likewise constructed a system of regulations, which, with a few modifications only, has existed to the present day. Many of the harbour improvements begun, the erection of a large number of lighthouses, and the adoption of a host of other measures in the interest of the sailor and the fisherman were likewise the work of his hands. It is not uncomplimentary to succeeding officers, or even to the present clear-headed and thoroughly able incumbent to say that since Hon. Peter Mitchell left the department of marine and fisheries, it has not had such another energetic and capable head. Like most other distinguished public men, though the pet and pride of their constituents, who sometimes become the victim of reason run wrong, Mr. Mitchell was once rejected on appealing to his constituents in Northumberland, New Brunswick, being defeated by one of the local millers of that place. His tireless figure has returned again to the commons, however, and he is now, as always, with sleeves rolled up, battling for the interests of the constituents who have the good fortune to call him their representative. The country is still to hear a good deal from Mr. Mitchell ; and it would, it will be readily admitted, be a loss to the dominion to have such a splendid ability out of harness.

The minister of Inland Revenue, Mr. (now Sir) W. P. Howland, whom we have already seen on several occasions, and whose figure is one the reader of Canadian history will not hesitate to admire, was one of the "commercial magnates" of Toronto when he entered public life. He was born in New York State, but removing to Toronto in his youth, he never knew sympathy for any other country than the Canada to whom he has since been as much indebted, as she has been to him. We have already seen that Mr. Howland entered public life in 1857, when he was elected, in the reform interest, for the west-riding of York. The good judgment, caution and foresight which had made him foremost among men of business, soon elevated him to the ranks of the prominent members of the legislature, and, as has been recorded already, though he was never unfaithful to his principles, he had true patriotism enough sometimes to shut his ears to the narrow dictates of party, and lend himself heart and hand to his country. That we do not overestimate the patriotism of Mr. Howland, is proven, if in nothing else, with abundant force by the assaults to which he was from time to time subjected by the Globe. But Mr. Howland's sense of duty was always stronger than his dread of newspapers, and he never hesitated to face the thunder at the call of his country's interests. At a meeting held in Toronto after the formation of the first dominion ministry, Mr. Howland and Hon. Wm. McDougall, both of whom made an able defence of their course in entering the coalition, were read out of the reform party. At this meeting the grit tyrant was the swaying spirit. A perusal of the speeches shows that both Messrs. Howland and McDougall ably defended themselves; but they had to reckon not alone with a question of right or wrong, or of duty to party, but with an all-powerful chief burning with revenge towards the two men who had refused to follow him from the coalition cabinet, and an ambition, that, like a high-blooded horse, which becomes the more unmanageable the longer it is kept confined, had now passed restraint, and could not be appeased by anything short of office, and the destruction of all that had crossed its path. Mr. Howland received the dicta of excommunication with somewhat of indifference, but when the time arrived that set him free to show his party preferences, he hesitated not in returning to his first love. In July, 1868, he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Ontario; and in later years received the dignity of knighthood, an honour, which, if a badge of recognition to merit, he had undoubtedly won.

Already have we had occasional glimpses of the postmaster-general. We first met him as a student in the law office of Mr. John A. Macdonald, and afterwards, in 1858, as a representative for Kingston in the legislative council. Four years after this date gout created a place for the talented young lawyer, by carrying off Sir Allan MacNab, speaker of the upper chamber. He became a member of the executive council and commissioner of crown lands in 1864, which position he retained till the union, when he became postmaster general. Mr. Campbell entered public life as a liberal-conservative, and has always remained true to his faith. He led the government in the legislative council of old Canada from 1858 until 1867, and in the senate from the latter period till 1873. But in the last-named year the government of the country fell into the hands of Mr. Mackenzie and his party, and Mr. Campbell thereafter, till the return of Sir John A. Macdonald to power, led the opposition in the upper house. Under the restored Macdonald ministry he has held different portfolios, and is at present minister of justice and leader of the government in the senate. He was created a knight C. M. G. by her Majesty on the 24th of May, 1879. It is perhaps rather unfortunate for those who are striving for the abolition of the senate, that such men as Sir Alexander Campbell should be found among the membership of that body; for it defeats the argument that the institution is entirely useless, since its supporters will readily point to some of its able men, and to the legislation which they have accomplished. Yet there is a way of looking at the question which proves that this contention is hollow. A certain firm erects a huge bakery in which it employs the best skill and labour that can be obtained, having abundance of fuel and unlimited tiers of ovens; but not content with the unbounded capacity for work in this establishment, it builds another equally as imposing and costly, and employs a large staff of heavily-paid workmen. A traveller passing the way stands bewildered before the new pile and asks, Why this grand structure? and the firm answers him, O they now and again bake a loaf in that building. But, still queries the nigh dumbfounded stranger, could you not do all your baking in the other establishment? Yes. Then why did you build, and why do you maintain this second bakery? That stranger has stood since by the imposing pile, and received no answer, save that which echo, ever ringing, gives. There are, it is true, other and weightier reasons offered for maintaining the "old feudal estate,"* but a very rude attempt at illustrating the same by figure shows that they are as untenable as the fallacy just pointed out. In such an institution a man with the wide understanding and the calm judicial character of Sir Alexander Campbell is as much out of place as would be admiral Drake at sea on a waterlogged barge, without sail or oar.

* This is "Bystander's" term for the Upper House.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE NEW REGIME.

BUT now the storm was over and the ship of state which had been tossed by so many tempests, rode safely at her moorings. The country looked hopefully into the future for political peace, and believed that such would be the fruit of this wider brotherhood, knitted together by the bonds of political and commercial interest. But Mr. George Brown and his lieutenants were not happy, and the untamable chief set himself to work, once more, to foment party discord. A few days before Mr. John A. Macdonald's new ministry was announced, a convention of reformers was held at Toronto, at which the proposed coalition was denounced in no charitable language. Messrs. McDougall and Howland happened to be in Toronto at the time of the meeting, and were considerably invited to attend, on the principle of the magistrate who, though quite clear as to the punishment he is about to inflict, generously resolves to hear what the culprit before the bar "has to say for himself." The two reform sinners appeared without much trepidation before Mr. Brown and his following. Mr. Howland said a new era was to be inaugurated; that the past had been wiped out as if it had never existed; that it was not the duty now of one party, but of all, to lend its support to the governing body under the new régime. Mr. McDougall's defence was still more telling than that of his fellow culprit, and those who watched the effect of the address upon "the meeting," saw that the underlings had begun to look at the coalition in a different light. But as we have elsewhere said the question was not one between these two reformers and public duty, or party duty, but between themselves and a thwarted ambition. They could not hope for mercy though the satraps had shown unmistakable signs of softening; and they got none. The ireful reform chief sought not the aid of ruses or obscure phrase to cloak his feelings. He simply read the two contaminated ones out of the party. It may be said that since that day Mr. McDougall, though deserving a better fate, has been unfortunate as a politician; though Mr. Howland, in due time—when the period arrived that his secession was not a violation of the original compact—returned to his first love.

The general election for the house of commons was held during the summer and early autumn. Quebec and Ontario emphasized their approval of union and coalition by returning overwhelming majorities of ministerialists; and George Brown was defeated in South Ontario. Coercion is a wholesome policy when dealing with the dagger and dynamite, but it is not a happy expedient in Canadian politics; as George Brown ascertained, but, as we might have supposed, without reaping any profit from the lesson. Though the dark-age organs, and the "anti" politicians of New Brunswick had waged bitter war against all who had favoured union, the ministry there carried twelve of the fifteen seats. Nova Scotia had been caught by a counter breeze and driven back from her late position. Dr. Tupper had worsted Joseph Howe before the imperial ministers, but the latter had the post mortem victory before the province. For once the sturdy doctor found that neither his lungs nor his courage were sufficient against the stream of burning eloquence that flowed from the "Great Anti." The battle for the confederates was another Flodden, one man only, and he, Dr. Tupper, reaching Ottawa with a tattered flag. Eighteen sturdy antis were sent up from the distant peninsula to the first dominion parliament. Probably Messrs. Howe and Annand had led the people to think that a majority of anti-union men at Ottawa might be able to unseal the fate of the province: but, confiding people, they were soon to see that they might as well have supposed them capable of effecting the quartering of the moon. Yet it was a triumph for Joseph Howe, a sort of local treatment for a very sore wound. No one doubts that the great Nova Scotia orator was a sincere patriot, but, like some other clever men he possessed in no little degree a sense of self-importance which sometimes dimmed or distorted his vision. The question of confederation to him may have, in the beginning, presented itself as a political problem to be worked out in its bearings on the public weal, but there can be little doubt that when Dr. Tupper assumed the lead and the great orator found himself in the place of second, the question became an argumentum ad hominem. It became, it is hardly unfair to the man's illustrious memory to say, a question not between the good and the bad side of union, but between the champions of confederation and Joseph Howe: like some of those persons who take the field in the interests of a moral question such as temperance, from the dictates of philanthropy and duty, but who, as the work goes on and they meet rebuffs, gradually become embittered, hating those whom they oppose and from whom they differ, breathing uncharitableness instead of good-will, losing sight of the original motives and making personal what was at the outset only a question of love for their fellowmen.

Meanwhile it was necessary to provide each province with a little government of its own. Hon. P. J. O. Chauveau became premier of Quebec, and, through the friendship of Sir John, Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald secured the leadership in Ontario, and formed a coalition which had a useful career for the four years succeeding. The two premiers were also elected to the federal parliament, as were many other prominent politicians from the same parliaments; but following the example of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which had passed acts making dual representation impossible, the anomaly was after a time abolished. During the lull between the election and the meeting of parliament, the chief morsel supplied to gossip was the resignation, by Mr. A. T. Galt, of the portfolio of finance. The true cause of the step was the inharmonious relations which existed between the retiring minister and some of his colleagues, and the diversity between his opinions and theirs on certain public questions. While these relations wore their worst feature, the policy of the finance minister was condemned in unmeasured terms by the opposition press, which declared that Mr. Galt, by his Currency Act, had deliberately favoured the bank of Montreal at the expense of other financial institutions, that the unfavourable turn which commerce had taken, and the failure of the Commercial Bank was due to his dishonest and unwise course. Finding little sympathy and support among his colleagues, and a storm of censure from the enemy, Mr. Galt resigned. The necessity of attending to his private affairs, he stated, induced him to take the step. We suppose he had the right to make whatever explanation he pleased. There are some things which are just as well kept from the coarse gaze of the people. The appointment of Hon. J. E. Cauchon to the speakership of the senate was a subject that helped to keep the public from going to sleep. M. Cauchon was a Frenchman with a bitter tongue, who had said many stinging things, and wounded a battalion of public men in his time; but he had also written a pamphlet L'union des Proviaces de l'Amerique Britanique du Nord, which proved an important factor in moulding opinion favourably to the union, lending the force of his unruly tongue also to the same end; and Sir John and his French colleagues believed that he was entitled, for these and other reasons, to the promotion mentioned. M. Cauchon proved himself an admirable speaker, bringing ability of a high order, and a becoming dignity, to the chair.

The new parliament met at Ottawa on the 7th of November. To the Canadian spectator a large number of the faces in the commons were new, the entire thirty-four representatives from the maritime provinces being strangers. Among the latter were Joseph Howe, one of the greatest orators of his day, a man who could carry his audience by his passionate eloquence as the sweeping wind sways the trees of the forest, and who, besides a distinguished public career, had made some creditable contributions to the literature of his province, and written some florid poetry, which however will not add many cubits to his stature; Dr. Tupper, his opponent, and of whom we shall have something to say in another place; Hon. Albert J. Smith, a competent lawyer with a strong tendency, under provocation, to lose his temper, talk rubbish, and forget his dignity, yet being capable of making a slashing speech at times, and administering a good deal of judicious annoyance to an opponent; Charles Fisher, who was an awkward but able lawyer, a comparatively mediocre politician when in office, but a very battering-ram, torpedo-boat, and many other things compounded when assailing a ministry; Timothy Warren Anglin, who was to the politics of his time what the stage-coach is in a railway age, and the carrier-pigeon in the days of electricity—a man with a strong and stubborn intellect, capable of a vast grasp, and endowed with an extraordinary memory—a forcible but diffuse speaker, who made long excursions in the by-ways of his argument, seldom delivering a speech within bounds suitable to the time of those whose temporal span is fixed at three score and ten, and whose patience is only good. The most important “new face” from Ontario was that of Mr. Edward Blake, of whom, in another place, we shall have just a word or two to say.

Hon. James Cockburn was elected to the speakership of the commons. The ministerial speech contained the usual congratulations and foreshadowed the sessional programme. On the address there was some hot discussion, and when the Demosthenes from down by the sea rose to state why his province was dissatisfied with the compact, every whisper was stilled, every member sat with head thrust forward. Whether it was that expectation had looked for too much, or that the speaker failed to attain his usual height, there was no little disappointment, and Dr. Tupper following, fairly riddled the argument of the great orator by pointing out several inconsistencies in his speech, and proving that the union issue had not been fairly presented to the people of Nova Scotia. The address was carried without a division, and Howe sitting at his desk, the embodiment of grim dissatisfaction, reminded the on-looker of a volcano at rest, after a violent eruption. The chief business of the new parliament was an act reducing the rates of postage and organizing the post office savings bank system; and a measure providing for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, the route to be determined by the imperial government in accordance with the terms when obtaining the imperial loan.

An attempt was made to place the telegraph system under government control as had been done in Great Britain, but some of the grits said, Why not at once put the newspapers, and the writing of private letters, and our ledgers, and our man-servants, and our maid-servants, and our oxen, and our asses, and everything that is ours under the control of the government? and for once, the grits took, probably, a very wholesome and correct view of the matter. It is not the duty of government to take charge of railways, and telegraph lines, and steamers, in order that these may be run and managed properly; but it is their duty to use the powers in their hands to have them so conducted. If two mail-coach drivers get into the habit of running into each other as they pass on dark nights, breaking the bones of passengers and destroying property, it is not the duty of government to mount the box and drive the coaches; but it is their duty to see that one and both carry lights; that each takes his own side of the road; that in certain places he must not drive at greater speed than may be prescribed; and that, failing to observe these conditions, he pay a fine or suffer other punishment at the hands of the law. It is not the function of government, let us repeat, to manage railways—unless under some exceptional condition—but it is its duty to protect the public against railway monopolies by so framing its legislation as to maintain competition and make aggregation and monopoly impossible. The tendency in this age of gigantic public enterprise, like in England under the heptarchy, is for the greater to absorb or swallow the lesser, and half a glance shows us that this centralization is going on in monster corporate affairs, the weaker day by day vanishing from the scene, falling a victim to the coercion or the bribe of the stronger. Watching the Grand Trunk and the Canada Pacific railways in this country reminds one of nothing so much as a pair of whales devouring all the smaller fish that come in their way, and halting on occasion, trying to bolt one another. Corporation is rapidly becoming king in Canada as in the republic, and the duty of our government is to thwart him.*

Hon. John Rose assumed charge of the department of finance, vacated by Mr. Galt, and applied himself with diligent zeal to the duties of his office. The reform press said he was only a "baby in finance," but censure being the platform of opposition, the statement did not overwhelm the new official, who made a very efficient and clear-sighted administrator. On the 4th of December, Hon. Wm. McDougall moved a series of resolutions based on the 146th section of the British North America Act providing for the incorporation of Rupert's Land and the North-West territory into the Dominion of Canada. After a week's discussion the resolutions were adopted, and an address embodying the same was forwarded to the Queen's government. On the 21st of December, parliament adjourned till the 20th of March, the object of the long interim being to give the local legislatures an opportunity to complete their sessions. The close of the year was marked by the death of Mr. Fergusson-Blair, president of the legislative council, a man of moderate views—with preferences for the liberal party—and genuinely devoted to his country's interests.

During the recess, Howe again led the forlorn hope in Nova Scotia, and in full harness thundered around his little province, declaring that the "tie must be broken." The local legislature met on the 30th of January, 1868, and an address was passed praying for the repeal of so much of "the act for the union of Canada and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as related to Nova Scotia." Four provincial delegates, with Howe at their head, were deputed to lay the address at the foot of the throne, but the ambassadors of disintegration were confronted at the home office by Dr. Tupper, who once again carried away the laurels. When the Dominion parliament met, the opposition censured the government for having sent Dr. Tupper to London, but in a little grew ashamed of this contention, and said no more about it. And now, while the commons was in the midst of its duties, an event happened which sent a thrill of horror through the country and brought legislation to a stand-still. One of the ablest members in the house, and perhaps its most brilliant orator, was Thomas D'Arcy McGee. A short sketch of his career must be interesting to all so familiar with his name and the circumstances of his untimely end. He was born of humble parents in the County of Louth, Ireland, in 1825. The advantages of higher education, which were open only to the rich man's son, were denied to young McGee; yet, young eagle that he was, he aimed to soar, and no circumstance could trammel the yearning spirit within his breast. He had the flashing eloquence of his nation, that gift which no Irishman ever acquires by putting pebbles in his mouth or going down by the shore to declaim above the thunders of the surf; for the kind fairy who still lingers about the green springs in the wild valleys, or visits the cabin at night, when the peasant sleeps, gives him this grace for naught; and he appears upon his first platform an orator, though untaught, as the duckling swims who has had no lesson. When young McGee reached his seventeenth year, he turned his face to the new world, where his ardent fancy painted him a name and high position; and on reaching New York, plunged like a red-hot cannon-shot into journalism. McGee has been described by those who enjoyed nothing in common with him save the Caucasian relationship as being an impulsive liberator of the loud-mouth description, only somewhat brilliant, and ambitious to help the cause of Ireland. Some of this is true as far as it goes, but it does not penetrate beyond the husk of that splendid but rudderless ability. Mr. McGee was an ardent patriot but his patriotism was not a cause but a consequence, the outcome indeed of a wild poetic sentiment, which delighted in nothing so much as weaving impossible schemes in impracticable spheres. He was more poet than patriot or politician, yet is his verse third-rate and disorderly as his early career, giving proof that their owner mistook the merchandise of the muse for a sentiment that it was the duty of its possessor to stifle, but which here and there, and manifestly against the author's will, displayed true notes which indicated the "soul of song," like the jets which, bursting up, tell of the subterranean waters. This young man, on the New York press, pouring out brilliant and reckless writing to a class that devoured as they wondered, was like a blood colt, unbroken and full of fire, that some admirer deliberately harnesses into regulation work. It is not necessary to chronicle casualties, for they will be predicated of such a procedure. But young McGee became famous, and after his name had grown familiar through Ireland, he returned to his native country, in 1845, and became editor of the Dublin Freeman's Journal. But to this young eagle the Journal was an old coach, too slow for the time and his ambition; and he cast in his lot with Charles Gavan Duffy and several other firebrands, who could see everything and everywhere under the sun except before them, and became one of the writers on the Nation. Setting off mere harmless fireworks soon lost its charm for him; eventually he was lured into the Smith O'Brien chimera—and fled from Ireland disguised as a priest. He had gone up like a rocket and come down like a burnt stick. He then established the New York Nation, a weekly journal containing, issue after issue, imprudence and fire; and with this minister of his mad spirits he succeeded in convulsing the Irish population of New York till Bishop Hughes interfered, and quietly put his foot on the publication. Out of the ashes of this dead brand arose The American Celt, which was established in Boston. About this time, through what means no one can tell, McGee suddenly paused and asked himself: Have I been on the right road? Have I used the talent I possess in the proper way? Have I any hope of achieving that for which I aim, by following out the course I have so long pursued? To all these queries his mind returned, and his career returned, negations. And, struck like Saul with sudden conviction, he was from that hour a changed man. Henceforth he resolved not alone to pursue a new way, but to endeavour to make amends for the past. He removed to Buffalo, and there for four years issued the Celt, no longer a fiery dragon, but the bearer of messages of peace and good-will. The fame of the editor spread over the continent, and he made several visits to Canada lecturing in the chief towns. At length, in 1857, at the earnest request of a large number of Irish Catholics, he removed to Montreal, where he established The New Era, in which, with masterly eloquence, and strong and searching argument, he advocated a federation of the British North American colonies. He had now, once admitted into political fellowship with British colonists, grown an ardent supporter of imperial institutions;—and bloodshot eyes in the lodges of the Fenian Brotherhood began to lower ominously upon him. We have already introduced him to the reader on his entry into parliament for Montreal, and pass on to the period of the election after the union. Time and residence among British colonists had surely wrought strange changes in this man. He was now an impassioned devotee of the Queen, and regarded the invasion of this country by the Fenians with no feeling short of horror. The Irish in Montreal, in proportion as the man expressed regret for the past, began to fall off from him, and he narrowly escaped defeat at the general election after the union. He was then stricken down by sickness from which he rallied slowly, but eventually took his place in the commons again. He had received many letters making threats upon his life from members of the same bloody brotherhood who are now busy with dynamite ; and the shadow of impending doom fell across his path. He who had been once so jovial at the festive board, so lightsome and brilliant in speech, had grown thoughtful and melancholy, and seldom was seen to smile. On the evening of the 6th of April, he delivered one of his most masterly and statesman-like speeches in the commons, counselling the adoption of pacific measures towards Nova Scotia. The house adjourned about two o'clock in the morning, and the members departed for their homes. McGee accompanied by several others, who parted with him at the corner of Sparks and Metcalfe streets, proceeded towards his own lodging-house on Sparks street. As he was engaged inserting his key in the latch, a figure which had been crouched by the door awaiting his coming rose and fired a pistol. The ball crashed through McGee's brain, and he fell dead across the threshold. In a few moments a crowd was about the spot, but no trace of the assassin could be found. When the wires flashed the news abroad, the country was paralyzed with horror. On the following day, in a voice inarticulate with emotion and sorrow, Sir John Macdonald rose and moved the adjournment of the house, paying tribute in well chosen words to the eminent qualities of the deceased, the loss the country had sustained, and expressing his sympathy with the bereaved family of the illustrious dead. A pension of £300 per annum was spontaneously voted to the widow, and provision was made for the education of the children. Large rewards were offered for the apprehension of the murderer, and before long a Fenian named Whelan was arrested, tried and found guilty. He was hanged in Ottawa on the 11th of February, 1869.

Parliament re-assembled on the 14th of April, 1868, continuing the sitting till the 22nd of May. The most important work of the session was the passage of the new customs and militia acts, and a measure to secure the independence of parliament. This latter act provided that any person holding an office of profit or emolument under government is ineligible for a seat in parliament, and any person sitting or voting under such circumstances was made liable to a fine of $2,000 per day. The act has been the means, to a great extent, of keeping the parliament pure, though a few years later it was ascertained that a member of the house, while sitting as speaker of the house of commons, was the recipient of a large printing contract from government. This, unhappily, is not the only breach of the act on record.

In July two lieutenant-governors were appointed, Hon. W. P. Howland for Ontario, and Hon. A. L. Wilmot, who both in politics and jurisprudence had been brilliant, but in neither profound, for New Brunswick. Meanwhile the feeling of hostility to union in Nova Scotia had not decreased, but rather, owing to the clever writing and address of those irrepressible antis, the Annands and others of equal note, had become so intensified that Sir John Macdonald suggested to his colleagues the propriety of some members of the cabinet attending the conference to be held in Halifax, in August. Accordingly, thither proceeded Sir John and several other members of the government. They reasoned, expostulated, offered to investigate any grievance, and as far as possible to remedy the same; but the antis were not to be comforted, and the Canadian delegates returned home, the premier not without the hope however, that the seed had not fallen entirely on stony ground. Still he did not rest content with hope which he knew very well tells too many flattering tales, but offered to revise the conditions of Nova Scotia's connexion with the confederation, and invited Joseph Howe to a seat in the ministry. Mr. Howe carefully reviewed the situation, and seeing that his refusal of Sir John's terms would only be the prolongation of a hopeless struggle that could only bring bitter fruit, gave way, and, in January of the new year, 1869, entered the government as president of the council. At a cabinet meeting the details of the "Better Terms" sought for Nova Scotia were determined: Canada undertook to assume $9,186,756 of the provincial debt instead of $8,000,000 as originally fixed, and to grant an annual subsidy of $82,698 for ten years.

Lord Monck having taken such an able and zealous part in forwarding confederation, his term of office had been extended two years, that the new government might be inaugurated under his auspices. The extended period had expired on the 14th of November, and the governor, with some emotion, bade farewell to the country in which he had taken so deep an interest. For his services in Canada he was created a peer of the United Kingdom with the title of Baron Monck, of Ballytrammon, in the County of Wexford. His successor was Sir John Young, better known to us as Lord Lisgar, the eldest son of an Irish baronet, a conservative in politics and the representative of Cavan in the imperial parliament. He had been governor of the Ionian Islands and of New South Wales, and when he reached Canada was in his sixty-second year.

The second session of the first parliament of New Canada met on the 15th of April. Mr. Howe introduced a series of resolutions embodying the stipulations of the order-in-council; but Mr. Blake contended that the measure was ultra vires, inasmuch as the imperial parliament having settled the basis of union the Canadian government could not change it. Mr. Mackenzie in a speech less eloquent and powerful than Mr. Blake's, but one charged with facts and dissolving argument, supported the contentions of the latter; but Mr. John Hillyard Cameron, Dr. Tupper and others, supported the resolutions with much power and an array of possible and improbable cases that altered, to the view of the house, the complexion which had been given to the case by the speeches of Messrs. Blake and Mackenzie. There is nothing in the sphere of politics stronger than eloquence, except numbers; and Howe's resolutions were carried by a large majority.

In August, Prince Arthur, one of the Queen's sons, visited Canada, and was received with profuse hospitality. A month or two later in the season Mr. Rose resigned his portfolio and went to London, England, as a member of the well-known banking firm there. Mr. Francis Hincks having returned to Canada, though not as Mr. Francis, but as Sir Francis, from the government of Barbadoes and the Windward Islands, was offered by Sir John, and accepted, the vacant portfolio of finance. The country had the fullest confidence in his financial skill, remembering his splendid record as inspector-general, and he was returned to the house of commons for North Renfrew. Several other changes were also made in the cabinet, Mr. J. C. Aikens becoming secretary of state and registrar-general; Mr. Dunkin, minister of agriculture; Mr. Alexander Morris, minister of inland revenue, and Mr. Howe, secretary of state for the provinces. Mr. McDougall, whom we are to see again, was appointed governor of the North-West territories, and resigning his seat in the ministry, proceeded with his family to that distant wilderness, where, blind to the bitter disappointment the future held in store, a reasonable ambition whispered in his ear, a vast range of opportunity would be opened to his energy and talents, and he would add renown to his name.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE HALF-BREED.

THE Hudson Bay Company agreed to surrender their rights in the North-West territory for £300,000, to be paid by the Dominion government; but all the existing rights of the company, with certain reservations, should first revert to the imperial government. The reservations included some 500,000 acres of land adjacent to the trading posts of the company, one twentieth of the land in the fertile tract lying to the south of the north branch of the Saskatchewan, with the stipulation that the rights of the Indians and half-breeds should be respected. Within a month after the reversion, the territory was to be ceded to the Dominion; and the Canadian government passed a measure providing for the government of the newly acquired territory. By this act provision was made for the appointment of a lieutenant-governor, and a council to carry on the administration, and the rights of the Indians and half-breeds, it was expressly declared, were to be respected; while all laws in force in the territories not clashing with the British North-America act or the terms of admission were to be held as valid until repealed. For many years Hon. Wm. McDougall, on the platform and in the press, had advocated the acquisition of this territory, and at a time when most men regarded the distant wilderness as a dreary region of muskeg and eternal frosts, affording harbourage only to wild beasts, he declared that it would prove a source of untold wealth, and could support millions upon millions of people. It was felt now, when the territory was to be added to Canada, that none other there was so worthy the honour of first governing this extensive terra incognita as Mr. McDougall, and so on the announcement being made that the company had surrendered the territory to the British government, this gentleman was appointed to the governorship, though the proclamation was not to take effect till the region had passed into the hands of the Dominion. Early in September, therefore, and without waiting till the month had elapsed, Mr. McDougall, with his family, set out from Ottawa on the long and tiresome journey to Fort Garry, the seat of his future government.

Meanwhile a party of surveyors, under Lieutenant-Colonel Dennis, a gentleman swayed largely by the warlike instinct, had been at Fort Garry and the districts surrounding, laying off lots and townships. The ignorant half-breeds, naturally, looked upon the new-comers, with their tapes and chains, with some alarm; and they soon became seized with the fear that the land which they and their ancestors had held at the hands of the company, for generations, was now to be wrested from them by the government, and that for this very purpose the strangers were here measuring off the territory. The inhabitants of the country consisted of French-Canadian half-breeds, descendants of the voyageurs and coureurs des bois who had for several generations trapped, and traded for furs, throughout these wild regions. They were all members of the catholic church, servile in their obedience to the priests, but steeped in ignorance and ready to follow any clever demagogue who could work upon their fear or prejudice. They had been informed that Dennis and his surveyors were to visit their territory to seize their ancestral lands, and they promptly and without any show of grace demanded of the strangers, busy with their chains and levels, to know if what they had been told was true. For, if it is, they said, we shall resist the aggression, and prevent anybody else from settling upon the territory of which you are about to rob us. One might have supposed that Dennis' staff would explain to these deluded people that their rights would be respected, and what the object of the survey was ; but they took a different course : they told the poor half-breed that the less he had to say about opposing settlers, and thwarting government the better ; that there was plenty of soldiers in Canada to enforce obedience. To make the matter worse the English inhabitants scattered through the territory, who owed no love to their half barbarous neighbours, indulged in much injudicious exultation over the proposed change. All these causes combined produced pernicious fruit. The half-breeds became mad with excitement, and only waited for some one to lead them to mischief. Not long were the leaders wanted. In hot haste rose John Bruce, Louis Riel, and Ambrose Lepine ; and with their appearance the country burst into rebellion. Colonel Dennis, who had been on the spot and at first treated the idea of conciliation and explanation with due military contempt, now began to grow alarmed, and wrote to Mr. McDougall that things had taken on an ugly face. Meanwhile the rebels had formed a provisional government with John Bruce at its head ; but the ruling spirit was Louis Riel, a daring, young French-Canadian, wily as a savage, brilliant and energetic. He appealed to the prejudices and the fear of the half-breeds, and in a few days had four hundred men at his back.

The new governor, in the meantime, unconscious of what was going on, had been travelling with all possible speed to the seat of government. While on the way from St. Paul, he heard that the half-breeds were in arms ; but undaunted by the intelligence he pushed on. At Pembina, however, he was served by a half-breed with a notice from the " National Committee " forbidding him to enter the territory ; but still heedless of warnings he proceeded with his councillors to the Hudson Bay Company's post, about two miles beyond the frontier. Here he was apprised by Colonel Dennis of the true state of affairs, and learned that large parties of armed men had been despatched by Riel to various points between Fort Garry and Pembina, to oppose his progress. Not having a sufficient force to fight his way to Fort Garry, Mr. McDougall had no alternative but to call a halt. He wrote a despatch to Ottawa setting forth the state of matters, and also despatched a messenger to Governor McTavish, at the Fort ; but his messenger was captured by a party of armed men, and sent back under escort, with the warning not to attempt a similar enterprise again. Some time after this occurrence a party of fourteen armed horsemen drew up before Mr. McDougall's halting-place and demanded an interview. They notified the governor that he must leave the territory before nine o'clock on the following day ; but after some expostulation they rode away "considering the matter," returning, however, on the following morning, showing a desire to use violence. Mr. McDougall and his party retired promptly across the border, and took up lodgings at the house of a friendly Irishman, in Pembina, where they remained till the return to Ontario.

Since we have last seen the conspirators, amazing success has waited on their fortunes. Only the few Canadian settlers among them had shown hostility to the rising. The officers of the Hudson Bay Company sat with folded arms when a decisive step would have stamped the rebellion out ; for they no more than the half-breeds relished the prospect of a new regime, having come, from their long possession in these wilds, to regard themselves as the rightful lords and masters of the territory. But the highest authority in the country was the catholic church, one of whose priests, in the field, would have been as powerful as Colonel Dennis and fifty cannon. Unfortunately the resident bishop, the Right Reverend Alexandre Antoine Taché, was at the time in Rome, and the pious priest in charge of the diocese, during the bishop's absence, was too conscientious to interfere in the interests of peace, and to prevent bloodshed, though his catechism had told him,—and he might have read it in the scriptures—that "he that resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall purchase to themselves damnation." The good priest and his ignorant flock, however, were not so much awed by the threat of "damnation" as dazzled by the successes of the impulsive and shortsighted Riel. On the 24th of November the insurgents, under Riel, took possession of Fort Garry, set the authority of Governor McTavish, who was now stricken down with mortal illness, at defiance; and fell to feasting on the stores of the company. The Canadian settlers having taken the alarm, gathered together to the number of about fifty and took refuge in the house of Dr. Shultz, but the dwelling was besieged; the inmates were captured, and marched off to Fort Garry where they were put in confinement.

The proclamation appointing Mr. McDougall to the governorship of the territory, and annexing the latter to the dominion was not to go into effect till the 1st of December, but for weeks previous to that date the intended governor had been performing the functions of a regular ruler. In this he was guilty of a grave error, and when tidings of his course reached Ottawa the government felt the gravest alarm. But Mr. McDougall was not a solitary blunderer upon the scene. When the first day of December arrived he issued a proclamation commanding the insurgents peaceably to disperse to their homes under pain of the rigours of the law. He likewise authorized Colonel Dennis to raise a force to put down the insurrection; and a few days later that worthy soldier was found among the lodges of the Sioux Indians trying to array the chiefs into hostility against the insurgents. Whatever some writers, who, when passing judgment, were in a quiet room, in the midst of a peaceful city, may affirm to the contrary, we are unable to see any great lack of judgment in the governor of a territory in revolt against the supreme authority raising a force to establish order. But it appears that the Canadian government, unwilling to accept a province seething with tumult, did not bind itself to the time fixed in its own proclamation, so that the ordinances of Mr. McDougall, who was ignorant of what had been done, were invalid; and he was held responsible for the blunders of the ministry. Meanwhile Colonel Dennis set himself to work to raise a force, but Riel and his followers only laughed at the chief of the surveyors, who, disgusted and chagrined, left the territory; while Mr. McDougall, finding he had made a false step, for which he was only in part to blame, that public opinion was against him, and that the government had, without understanding his difficulties, and dealing with decision themselves, censured his proceedings, returned disheartened and disgusted to Ontario, where he published a series of letters affirming, and with such proof as lent but too much probability to his story, that the Hudson Bay Company and the Roman Catholic clergy of Red River had to some extent fomented the rebellion, and that his own late colleague, Hon. Joseph Howe, secretary of state, who had visited the region a short time before was, not to a small extent, responsible for the uprising. On Mr. McDougall's way home, he met upon the plains three emissaries, Vicar-general Thibault, Colonel De Salaberry and Donald A. Smith, each bearing, from the Canadian government, to the insurgents, a copy of a proclamation issued by Lord Lisgar, containing, in conclusion, the following paragraph:—"And I do lastly inform you that in case of your immediate and peaceable obedience and dispersion, I shall order that no legal proceedings be taken against any parties implicated in these unfortunate breaches of the law." Mr. McDougall pursued his way home, and he was not much to be blamed if he offered no prayer for the success of Commissioner Salaberry. The emissaries proceeded on their way, but had no sooner reached Fort Garry than they were pounced upon, and deprived of their papers without being given an opportunity to offer a word of explanation. Riel's head had failed him in the trying moment of prosperity, and he was now fairly delirious with success. He came to believe himself lord and master of the territory; he confiscated property, overthrew every barrier to his will, and banished from the country such as had aroused his fear or ire. It is difficult to tell what punishment he had in store for Dr. Shultz and the band of Canadians now locked in the fort ; but one night, three weeks after the incarceration, the doctor made his escape, and rallying a number of settlers around him demanded the surrender of the prisoners. The sturdy front of Shultz and his followers, and the entreaties of several prominent residents induced Riel to yield to the request, but he openly stated that he would recapture Shultz, who might depend upon a sore reckoning. The threatened man silently left the territory, and remained in Ontario till better days. Upon one other person, too, had the insurgent cast a murderous eye. On the night of the 15th of February, there was a rising at the Portage, and about a hundred sturdy settlers, who were loyal to the Canadian government, placed themselves at the disposal of Major Boulton, a Canadian officer of militia. This force marched to Kildonan, where they were joined by three hundred and fifty others, the most of whom were English half-breeds, wretchedly armed, undisciplined, and without food enough for a single meal. The result of such a rising can be readily predicted. Major Boulton, a brave officer, though leading for want of better such a helpless assemblage, was, with forty others captured, thrown into prison, and sentenced by court martial to be shot. Through the earnest entreaties, however, of Mr. Smith, the Bishop of Rupert's Land, Archdeacon McLean, the Catholic clergy and other influential citizens, he was released ; though it went sorely against the will of Riel to deliver him up. The latter was now dictator and "president" of the "provisional government" formed by the insurgents ; and each day that he enjoyed this power he grew more overbearing and dangerous to those who resented his will.

But Riel's worst offence so far was rebellion, and a high-handed use of his unlawful powers ; he was yet to enact the foulest crime that stains the page of Canadian history. It appears that among the besieged at Dr. Shultz's house was one

Thomas Scott, a sturdy and spirited young fellow, who had moved to the territory from Ontario. He did not surrender with the main body of Canadian settlers, but was arrested the same evening and confined in the Fort. Scott was a fiery youth, loyal to the government, but indiscreet enough to make speeches which brought upon his head the wrath of the dictator. There is now no doubt that for Scott Riel had conceived a personal hatred. Twice had he risen in arms against the insurgents, and even under the lock and key of the president made no effort to suppress his turbulent spirit. One morning the story was told that the prisoners had heaped gross insult upon their half-breed guards, that the example had been set by Scott, and that the latter's conduct was no longer tolerable. Whether the story was true or not it served the bloodthirsty purpose of Riel, who, with murder in his eye, on the evening of the 3rd of March, within the walls of the fort, improvised a court martial, consisting of the "council of seven," to try Scott. The crimes for which he was to be tried were resistance to the provisional government, and assault upon one of his keepers. Riel appeared in the character of prosecutor, witness and judge, and refused to allow Scott to be present at the trial, or to make any defence. After a brief consultation, the seven sentenced the victim to be shot on the following morning at ten o'clock. When news of the unheard-of proceedings, and the barbarous sentence got abroad, there was even in that rebellious fort general excitement, and much sympathy was expressed for the condemned man. Rev. Mr. Young, a Methodist minister, Père Lestang, Mr. Smith and others, besought with tearful earnestness that the sentence might be commuted, but the president was thirsting for Scott's blood, and, with his barbarous ally Lepine, peremptorily refused to listen to any plea for mercy. Poor Scott, as may be supposed, could scarcely realize his position; and did not at first believe that the bloody sentence would be carried out. But a few minutes past noon on the following day, the executioners, a band of half-breeds, partially intoxicated, came into his cell, and led him out blind-fold through the chief entrance to the fort to a spot a few yards distant from the wall. "My God, my God," he could only say, in a tremulous voice, "this is cold-blooded murder." His coffin, covered with white cotton, was carried before him, and laid down at the spot planned for execution, where the firing party of six half-breeds under "Adjutant-general" Ambrose Lepine, now drew up. Scott then, his arms pinioned, knelt on the ground, said farewell, and fell back pierced by three bullets. The victim it was observed was not dead, and one of the firing party stepping over to where he lay bleeding upon the snow, drew a revolver which he discharged into his head. The body was then thrust into the coffin, and there are those that witnessed the bloody deed who assert that the cry of the dying man could be heard after the lid had been fastened down. What was afterwards the fate of the corpse, no one save those engaged in its disposal knows. It was reported that the body had been burned in the fort, but the box, which was alleged to have contained the remains was found to contain naught but stones. The general opinion is that the corpse was thrust below the ice in Red River.

At the first tidings of the outbreak it occurred to Sir John Macdonald that Bishop Taché's presence would do more to quell the disturbances than any other means at the disposal of the government. His lordship, however, as we have seen, was at the time in Rome, attending a session of the famous Ecumenical council, but the ministers considered the case urgent enough to invite the bishop to return and use his endeavours towards restoring peace. The prelate, at no little sacrifice, tore himself away from Rome and proceeded to Canada. On arriving at Ottawa, he received special instructions for the guidance of his mission. But unfortunately for the ends of justice, the bishop set out with the mistake of regarding himself a plenipotentiary with formal powers, whereas his mission was exactly in the character of that of Colonel de Salabery,

Donald A. Smith, and the vicar-general. Dr. Taché was chosen because it was but too apparent that some of the priests in his diocese sympathized largely with the rebels, and that the insurgents, almost to a man, were members of his flock. So, as in the dispatching of the three emissaries named, his lordship was given a copy of the proclamation, and also some private letters for his guidance. For example, among other things, Sir John Macdonald wrote: "Should the question arise as to the consumption of the stores or goods belonging to the Hudson Bay company by the insurgents, you are authorized to inform the leaders that if the company's government is restored, not only will there be a general amnesty granted, but in case the company should claim payment for such stores, that the Canadian government will stand between the insurgents and all harm." His lordship had also private conversations with Sir John and Hon. Joseph Howe, and a letter from the governor-general. But no member of the government looked upon the bishop's position as other than that of a peacemaker, bearing assurances from the government on specific points. Had he been a plenipotentiary he would have been given a formal commission with authority to deal, in the name of the government, with all past and possible offences. As a mere informal emissary and peacemaker, the bounds of his authority extended no further than the specifications in the letters of the ministers; and it might even be argued that the private letter of Sir John Macdonald, or of Mr. Howe, or even of Sir John Young, was not a valid authority, and was not so intended, and that ministers only wished to have the insurgents made aware of the disposition of the government. That the government did blunder in assuming that the mere uprising of the French Metis and the consumption of the Hudson Bay company's stores were the limit of Riel's offences, no one can deny; but this was not a justification, though it was the occasion, of the bishop's view of the question. It is not necessary to say that when his lordship set out from Ottawa, the ministry was ignorant of the murder of Scott.

On the 9th of March, five days after the death of Scott, the bishop bearing his credentials arrived at Red River. He presented his papers, remonstrated with the rebels, and in the name of the government of Canada made certain promises if they would lay down their arms. Among these, was that of a general amnesty to all implicated in the insurrection; as likewise to those concerned in the shooting of Scott. It is almost incredulous that the worthy bishop should have so far mistaken his powers as to include in the amnesty, upon his own responsibility, the perpetrators of this foul murder; yet such was his view, an opinion which he maintained stoutly to the end. He wrote, stating what he had done, to the secretary of state, Mr. Howe, but that gentleman promptly informed him that the government was not in a position to interfere with the free action of her majesty in the exercise of the royal clemency, though he requested his lordship to persevere in his endeavours to bring the population to peace and order, acknowledging, as was proper and due to the prelate, the value of his services so far to the cause of peace. For years afterwards the question of amnesty was a subject of discussion, the government affirming that they had never committed themselves to a pledge of pardon beyond what appeared in their published letters. The news of the murder of Scott filled the great bulk of the Canadian public with horror and indignation, and in a few days it was learnt with much satisfaction that General Sir Garnet Wolseley, who has since distinguished himself in Ashantee, Egypt and elsewhere, was to be sent to Red River with an ample military force. The news reached Fort Garry, and the murderer Riel and his colleague Lepine lost their bravado and shivered for fear. With the same secrecy of movement that the commander of the troops observed in his sortie upon the forces of Arabi Pasha, he was within rifle shot of Fort Garry ere anyone in the murderer's lair knew of the approach. Riel and Lepine took instant flight out of harm's way, and with lusty British cheers, and amid the thunder of a royal salute, the Union-Jack was hoisted above the fort.

Hon. Adams George Archibald had been, in the meantime, appointed to the governorship of the Territory, and on the 2nd of November assumed his official functions. In the following May—1871—he heard with alarm that a body of Fenians under the leadership of one O'Donoghue, who had been an ally of Riel, threatened an irruption. The governor was alone, surrounded by difficulties and unprovided with a defensive force; and being cut off by distance from communication with the central authorities, was thrown upon his own resources. It was an hour of grave peril, and to save the new province from the consequences of a conquest by such a filibuster as O'Donoghue and the band of ruffians in his following, Mr. Archibald leagued himself with the two murderers Riel and Lepine, who were still at large, though warrants were out for their apprehension, to resist the invaders. Promptly these two persons rallied, once again, the subsided Metis, whom they placed at the disposal of Mr. Archibald. The governor, it appears, had little misgivings in entering into this foul and revolting compact. He reviewed the murderers' troops, accepted their services, promised Lepine and Riel at least temporary immunity from molestation for their crime, shook hands with them, received a letter signed by them, and through his secretary addressed a written reply after the retreat of the brigand O'Donoghue, complimenting them on the loyalty they had shown and the assistance they had rendered. Indeed, the governor was of the impression that Riel and his followers offered their services in a spirit of genuine loyalty, "though," says Lord Dufferin, in a despatch to the secretary of state, "Sir John Macdonald appears to have had misgivings on this head." The strongest point by the lieutenant-governor, in justification of this sickening alliance, is made when he says: "If I had driven the French half-breeds into the hands of the enemy O'Donoghue, they would have been joined by all the population between the Assiniboine and the frontier; Fort Garry would have passed into the hands of an armed mob, and the English settlers to the north of the Assiniboine would have suffered horrors that it makes me shudder to contemplate.

At this period an all-pervading sense of etiquette had taken possession of archbishop * Taché, who maintained with a zeal worthy of a noble cause, that, by virtue of his commission from the Canadian government, and his declaration of an amnesty, Riel and Lepine had been placed beyond the molestation of the law. It is not necessary to detail incidents of this unseemly squabble between the bishop and the ministers. The question was submitted to the imperial government, and after much correspondence between Lord Dufferin and the colonial secretary, the latter left the subject in the hands of the governor-general. Lepine had been captured, and lay in the Winnipeg gaol under sentence of death, but this Lord Dufferin commuted to two years' imprisonment and a permanent forfeiture of civil rights. This was surely a triumph for murder and the archbishop. Riel, whose punishment would have been the same as Lepine's, for the time escaped the law—because the law shut its eyes—but, as we shall see, he afterwards paid the penalty of this and a later crime on the fell scaffold.

* His lordship about this time was created an archbishop.

CHAPTER XX.

THROUGH STORMS TO THE REEF.

IT is necessary now to take a few paces backward. On the 2nd of May, and while the territory was at the feet of the insurgents, Sir John Macdonald introduced an act to establish and provide for the government of the province of Manitoba, as this tumultuous region was to be henceforth called. Local affairs were placed under the control of a lieutenant-governor, who was aided by an executive council, the legislative machinery to comprise a house of assembly, and an upper chamber. Even in this wilderness province, so remote from the influences of the aristocracy, it was considered necessary to season the constitution with a pinch of feudalism, by creating a house of prairie-lords. The province having no public debt of which the Dominion should have borne a part, interest at five per cent per annum on $472,090 was guaranteed; a yearly subsidy of $30,000, and the usual general allowance of 80 cents per head, the population being estimated at 17,000. Ungranted territory was vested in the crown for purposes of the federal government; and to effect an extinction of the Indian title, 1,400,000 acres of land were set apart for the benefit of resident half-breed families. It was provided that the new province should become a partner in the federation on such date as the Queen in council should fix for the admission of Rupert's Land and the North-west territory into the union. Another important measure of this session was the banking act of Sir Francis Hincks, which found instant and settled favour with banking institutions and the commercial public. Not so successful was the honourable knight's tariff act, which bore on its face the semblance of protection, but in reality was a declaration of commercial war against the United States, with which reciprocity was desirable but impossible. From the first the ministry seemed to have lit'le heart in launching this measure. Sir John called it "forcing public opinion," which was not at that stage ready for a system of protection, much less a measure that promised the burthens, without the benefits, of such a policy. Nevertheless, something was needed, and Sir Francis came forward with his measure with the timid-courage of a boy, pole in hand, venturing out on the first ice of the season. Unfortunately for the ministry, long pressure of public business had told severely on the health of Sir John. He was frequently unable to attend parliament or cabinet meetings; and as the session drew to a close he became completely prostrated. Sir Francis and his colleagues battled bravely against the opposition and the defection in their own ranks, but the nerve had gone for the time from the hand that could alone make the rough smooth, and bring harmony out of disorder; and the measure passed after a severe battering, with a feeble majority. Among the able oppositionists might be counted Messrs. McDougall and Galt, for though they were labelled "Independent," on trying occasions they were found voting with the government. Mr. McDougall regarded himself, as he certainly was, a victim of the government's unenviable Northwest policy, and was not in opposition in the public interest, but for the sake of revenge; while Mr. A. T. Galt also turned a personal grievance into a ground of public policy.

The Fenians had their hearts set on capturing a piece of British territory, and when the rebellion broke out in the Northwest, O'Neil, whose acquaintance we have already made, nimbly reassembled his ragged brigade, and on the 25th of May, made a dash across the Missisquoi frontier; but was driven back, helter-skelter, by a handful of Canadian volunteers. Two days later, another band, made heroic with whiskey, swaggered across the border in Huntington county, but on being confronted by a few of our militiamen took wild flight again into sheltering territory. Even here they were not beyond harm, as their leaders were arrested by United States officials, and their arms, whiskey and other possessions confiscated. In the early autumn the announcement that the imperial government was about to withdraw the troops, called forth an earnest, if a not very manly, protest from several quarters. In reply, we were informed from the colonial office, that Great Britain felt that she now ought to be relieved of the burthen of our defence; that we had entered upon an era of peace, and that while the mother considered herself bound to defend us from foreign aggression, that she expected us, henceforth, to provide protection in our domestic affairs. We somewhat pitiably retorted that we had always furnished force to do our police duty, and did not need assistance now for that purpose; but the colonial office was inexorable, and said that what had been ordered could not be revoked. The forces were consequently called home from all the stations save Halifax, whose society, tavern-keepers and immorality are at least the gainers, if no boon is conferred upon the country. The only anomaly in the proceeding was the withdrawal of the troops from Newfoundland, which was then, and is to-day, not in the union. The imperial view was surely not less than rational and politic; though some of those who had talked after the union with so much sound about our magnitude and our future, were among the first to cry out, "O don't take away the soldiers." To boast of nationality in one breath, and to cry for protection in another, is at once impertinent and unmanly; and resembles nothing so much as a hale young man of twenty-one under the guardianship of a dry nurse. Our duty is to rely upon ourselves in the day of trouble, and we have spirit, and brain, and patriotism enough in this country, were the attenuated leading string of British connexion cut to-morrow, to resist all-comers as effectually as we could under our present system—which dampens national ardour, and undermines self-confidence—aided by imperial soldiers. The duty to home and kin is a strong incentive, if the duty can always be made to assume that personal form, but patriotism can be only predicated of those who possess a country, not of those who inhabit an instalment of territory belonging to somebody else, and who having fought the battle and overwhelmed the foe, are reminded that they are serfs by profuse thanks for the loyalty and courage they showed not to themselves, not to the country whose fields they till, and whose seas they sail, but to a foreign ruler whom they have never seen, and who lives beyond a dissevering ocean. This opinion is not for those enlightened, loyal Canadians, who think that the sovereign can cure their babies of king's evil; but for the manly, intelligent young fellow with the light of the age in his eyes, who loves his country, and takes wisdom for his guide; who believes that all men came into this world equal, as they must leave it equal, that gold, and place, and spurs belong alone to those who in honest strife can win them, that the custom which fixes perpetual authority in any family among the race of men, and declares that all others shall be subject and inferior, is one of the few relics of a barbarous age, a butt for the future historian, and an institution that he will take to represent the darkness of the century.

During the summer an important acquisition to the Dominion cabinet appears in the appointment of Hon. Charles Tupper, whose robust ability and unfaltering purpose, had all along favourably impressed Sir John, to the presidency of the council, in the room of the Hon. Edward Kenny, who had been appointed to the governorship of Nova Scotia. We have met Dr. Tupper already measuring his strength with Joseph Howe, and seen him return from England twice with the laurels; but this was no test of his prowess, since Howe was pitted not alone against his brother Nova Scotian, but against the imperial cabinet, which was zealous for union. Where the field was fair and there was no favour, it fared better with the giant, and we found Dr. Tupper, like Randolph Murray, returning to Ottawa, out of the fight, alone. But of Sir Charles' abilities, we might say of his genius, there can be no question. He began life, we believe, as a medical practitioner; and while enjoying an excellent prospect of eminent success in that profession, entered politics, in which sphere, by the sheer force of his abilities and the possession of a power that literally battered down every obstacle, had succeeded in forcing his way, as we have seen, to one of the most prominent places in his country. But the Dr. Tupper of that day, was not the Sir Charles of our present acquaintance. Never could anybody deny that great energy of character, and almost superhuman force; but for many years after his entry into public life, Dr. Tupper was almost insufferably verbose, and often bombastical. Language literally poured from the man; but his speeches were not remarkable for the closer and more incisive reasoning which runs through his public utterances now. Time has chastened and disciplined that ardent spirit, reduced the blaze to a sober glow, while not robbing the fire of its heat; yet without being disposed to unkind criticism, his speeches still—speeches that may always be called verbal tornadoes—on occasion may be described as savage, though in no instance we can remember of has the provocation not been ample. Of the question of dignity, and what is due to his position as a leading minister of the crown, Sir Charles Tupper is the best judge; though he must bear the writer to challenge the propriety of a member of the Canadian government descending to a personal attack, however well merited, on one who had degraded the press by making a newspaper the vehicle of vulgar spleen. Mr. Nicholas Flood Davin in his paper "Great Speeches" in the Canadian Monthly, from which we have already extracted, has this telling description of Sir Charles as an orator. "Sir Charles Tupper's most distinguishing characteristic . . . is force. Though he has not the scholarship nor finish of Mr. Gladstone, it is with Mr. Gladstone—were I searching for a comparison—I should compare him. Yet they are dissimilar in so many ways that the choice does not seem happy. They are alike however in this: extraordinary capacity for work, power of going from place to place, and making great speeches with little or no time for rest or study. Different in kind, his command of expression is as ready and effective as Mr. Gladstone's. He has the faculty of growth; the sure mark of a superior mind when found in a man over forty." The same writer goes on to say, and had he omitted saying it, we should not have thought so much of his paper: "I am sure that both he and Mr. Blake speak too long. If they could take off about thirty per cent. in time without impairing the texture of thought; if they could pack closer; how much more effective both would be. Sir Charles Tupper is not content while a single wall of the enemy's defences remains standing." Some of Sir Charles Tupper's most important work is too fresh in the mind of the reader to detail it here. For many years he has been an important figure in Canadian politics. Still in the prime of his manhood, though with health somewhat shattered, by a too-long overwrought brain, he now retired from office to fill a place of importance in the mother-country as high commissioner. May we not cherish the hope that many days may yet remain to him, after his mission in the new sphere is ended, and his health restored, in the performance of public duty in Canada.

The Reciprocity Treaty having expired, as we have seen, and the overtures of the Canadian government for renewal having proven fruitless, a state of affairs had arisen which provoked a strong feeling of hostility among our people towards the United States. With the expiry of the treaty, of course, all rights and privileges to both parties lapsed, yet American fishermen continued to fish in our coast-waters within prohibited limits. The Canadian government remonstrated with the Washington authorities, and the president of the United States issued a proclamation forbidding American citizens to further infringe upon the law. American schooners still appeared within the three-mile limit around our coast, putting out nets and spilliard trains; and even became so brazen in their disregard for authority, as to engage in taking fish during Sunday;—for which, in one instance, they paid the penalty by the inhabitants of a cove in Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, taking the law in their own hands, destroying the fishing gear of the intruders, and driving the violaters of the sabbath and the civil laws from the shore. The imperial and Canadian governments sent armed vessels along the coasts to prevent this international poaching, and several crafts caught in their unlawful work were seized and confiscated. Whereupon our American friends grew wrathful, and their high-pent feeling vented i'self in an unstatesmanlike and intemperate message from President Grant during the autumn. A number of irritating questions had now accumulated between the United States and Great Britain, and early in the year, 1871, it became known that these would be submitted for settlement to a joint commission appointed by both governments. The chief subjects for the adjudication of the commission were the fisheries question, to which we have alluded; the Alabama claims, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and of the Canadian canals, and the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia. Owing to some of the hazy definitions in the Oregon treaty, the ownership of the island of San Juan, in the strait of Juan de Fuca, which for the past twelve years had been occupied jointly by British and United States officials, had been open to dispute; and a settlement of this question was also referred to the commission. On the 10th of February, the United States government appointed as its representatives, the Hon. Robert C. Schenck, United States minister to the court of St. James; the Hon. Hamilton Fish, secretary of state; the Hon. Samuel Nelson, of the supreme court; the Hon. George II. Williams, of Oregon, and the Hon. Ebenezer R. Hoar, of Massachusetts. On the sixteenth of the same month, the imperial government appointed as its five representatives the Earl De Gray and Ripon, Sir Edward Thornton, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir John Macdonald and Montague Bernard, professor of international law in the university of Oxford. The appointment of a colonist on a commission to conserve imperial interests was an unusual course, but the eminent abilities of Sir John, and the vast Canadian interests at stake, induced the selection. It is an error, however, to suppose that, in any sense, Sir John was a Dominion representative; he was merely the interpreter of Canadian interests. On this commission, as events afterwards showed, our premeir found himself between the devil and the deep sea, between his duty as an imperial representative on the one hand, whose mission was to support any plan that would forward the interests of the empire as a whole, even though such measure should bear harshly upon his own province, and his duty to the interests of the Dominion on the other. The first meeting of the commission was held at Washington, on the 27th of February; and the sittings were continued at irregular intervals till the 8th of May. On this date the Washington treaty was signed, and the commissioners set out for their homes. In brief the treaty—which was ratified by the United States on the 24th of May, and by the imperial parliament on the 17th of June—provided for the settlement of the Alabama claims by an arbitration board to meet in Switzerland, and to which reference has already been made; the San Juan boundary dispute was referred for adjudication to the emperor of Germany, who gave the disputed island to the United States; while, with respect to the fisheries, our waters were thrown open to the American fishermen for a period of ten years, the compensation to the Canadian government, in lieu of this privilege, to be decided by a special commission.* It was provided that fish and oil should be admitted into the United States and Canada, from each country, duty free during a like period ; free navigation of the St. Lawrence and the Canadian canals was guaranteed to American citizens, a similar privilege being accorded to British subjects on Lake Michigan. As an offset to the claim for damages by the Confederate cruisers sailing from British ports, Sir John contended that the Dominion was, in a like measure, entitled to recompense for the ravages of Fenian marauders from American territory. Against an attitude which so much as refused to discuss this question, and with the tepid support of his brother commissioners, to whom imperial questions threw all others in the shade, Sir John was powerless ; and, as in some other points, he was obliged to yield. Some of his opponents afterwards maintained that in the face of this opposition it was his duty to have resigned, but that would have been for the premier to confess that he regarded himself as a colonial, and not an imperial representative ; that he had consented to enter the commission under false pretences ; for, as we have already stated, it was by the accident of his qualifications and the esteem in which he was held—and in any case only as an interpreter of Canadian interests—that he was appointed among the representatives ; and had he resigned the imperial will would nevertheless have been carried out, and perhaps without the dampening presence of another colonist. But that Sir John did do all that was consistent with honour and duty as a representative of imperial interest, became abundantly clear, and is, if by no other evidence, amply proven in the fact, that, up to a late period—if indeed down to this time—he had not been forgiven by imperial statesmen, for what, between themselves, they had been pleased to call his “ colonialism ” on the commission ; not a colonialism implying anything beyond what they regarded as too much zeal in Canadian interests, which clashed with those of the empire. It is not going too far to assume that, when we hear the premier’s Canadian opponents denounce him for having done too little for Canada, and hear imperial earls and knights who were with him whisper behind the door that he did too much, he did his onerous and difficult duty, honourably, conscientiously, and well. For a year the treaty was misrepresented throughout the country, and the premier and the ministry were loaded with abuse. The assailants were sorely mortified that they could elicit no official response, a silence maintained at the request of Sir John, who said that it would be time enough to explain when the politic period arrived and in the proper place. We shall skip a year to see the issue. In May, 1872, the storm broke, and Sir John was ready. His defence is given us in one of the ablest—perhaps the most effective—speeches of his life. We need not here attempt an outline of this address, which we give in full elsewhere,* or of the telling speeches by Sir Francis Hincks, Hon. Wm. McDougall, Hon. Charles Tupper, Hon. S. L. Tilley, Sir George Cartier, Hon. J. H. Cameron and others. All the speakers, understanding the painfully difficult position Sir John had held, and appreciating the highmindedness and ability with which he conducted himself, came forward in defence of their chief. Mr. John Hillyard Cameron said that “before entering into discussion on the various points of the treaty, he might be allowed to say a few words about one upon whom the eyes of all Canada were fixed, in whom the country had the deepest interest, and in whom, he ventured to say, the great mass of the people had the most implicit reliance. He referred to the gentleman who was entrusted, not only as a negotiator but as a representative of the empire, and of Canada, as a part of it; he whom so many had been accustomed to admire, and whom he (Mr. Cameron) had been permitted to follow, as his leader, for so many years. Probably there was no member of the house better entitled to speak of that gentleman than he. They had been friends for more than half the term of life allotted to man; they had been at school together, and had been in the government of Canada in the freshness of their youth, more than a quarter of a century ago; and from that year to this, although their positions had been very different, he had been always his political follower, and had endeavoured to be his faithful friend; and he believed there were very few among those who had been his friends, and followers during that long period of years who were not his staunch supporters now. There could hardly be a higher compliment paid to any man than that he should have continued to hold the position he had held during the many years past; and he felt compelled to say this, because heartless attacks had been made upon his character and honour. They all knew, every one of them, and he (Mr. Cameron) recollected well, the time when he first came so prominently before the public. They might have looked through their own party, in and out of politics, and could not have found a single man his superior, and in the opposition party they could not find a man either his superior or his equal. During all those years he had carried out those measures which he considered were for the country's good. In many he (Mr. Cameron) did not concur, but in many had agreed; and of all men competent to deal with the affairs of the people, he had always considered that there was no one so competent as he, Sir John Macdonald. He (Mr. Cameron) had seen his skill and ability at all times and under all circumstances, and there was no one among them who had not had an opportunity over and over again of forming a judgment upon them. He would ask them to recollect how, when circumstances had withdrawn him, when debates and discussions were going on, they had felt that the chords were jangled and the instrument out of tune, and when he returned again how his master hand evoked a harmony that no other hand was able to produce. They had all known it. They had seen him in his position there using his talents and great ability for the benefit of the country. Had he turned those talents and that ability to his profession, he would have won both wealth and fame. Whilst other politicians were making their fortunes, no one ever felt otherwise than that that man was poor, because he never allowed his political or parliamentary influence to be used in order that he might in the slightest degree make pecuniary capital of his position. Did not they all feel that one reason why his honourable friends opposite had raged so furiously against him, had been because of what his hon. friend from Lambton had said the other night that his (Sir John's) path was marked by the graves of dead politicians. He (the member for Lambton) had boasted of the purity of reform principles, and of the strength and power of reformers; and yet he had seen their foremost men, one by one—even the great Anak himself—become the willing captives of his bow and spear, and march to their political death under the eye of their conqueror; while they contended that what their opponents termed "political death" was really political regeneration. That was their position; and their support of his hon. friend had been not merely in reference to his great political ability, but it had been in regard to what he had been to all of them. He had always been generous and easy of access, ever mingling courtesy with kindness. No man ever had more devoted friends and followers. He had grappled them to his heart with hoops of steel, and had kept them there. Over and over again he had carried them forward with him to victory, and he believed that now, as ever, his latest and crowning victory would be the response which the parliament of Canada would make to the appeal that they should ratify the treaty. His party were indignant that the charge of treason and the name of "Judas" should be used against him. Notwithstanding the taunts and the violence of the opposition—notwithstanding the accusations they made—they would find that, in the opinions not only of a large majority of the members of the house but of an equally large majority of the people of the country, there was no man under whose banner they would more gladly advance, either to victory or defeat, than that of the hon. member who led them." At the conclusion the house showed its loyalty to Sir John, and its confidence in his ability and integrity by ratifying so much of the treaty as referred to Canada by a vote of 121 to 55. From Ontario there was a majority of 10; from Quebec, 29; from Nova Scotia, 11; from New Brunswick, 7; from Manitoba, 3, and from British Columbia, 6.

It is necessary now to retrace our steps a short way, to take up the thread of our general narrative. Parliament opened on the 15th of February, 1871. Sir Francis was in high spirits; commerce felt a fuller life in her veins, the outlook was still more cheering, and the ministers had $200,000 to spare after meeting all current expenditure. Several measures of importance were introduced during the session, chief among these being acts providing for the assimilation of the currency, the readjustment of the tariff, for the management of savings banks, and the establishment of a new banking system. It was during this session that the act was introduced providing for the admission of our distant relative, British Columbia, into the united family. The Pacific province was not enthusiastic for the compact, but like the maiden who marries for money instead of for love, made her union conditional upon the construction of a railroad; and as marriages contracted with such motives do not always "turn out well," it is not surprising that before the Pacific spouse had ceased to be a bride, she was in the courts for divorce. The Canadian parliament rose on the 14th of April; and on the 16th of May, an imperial order-in-council was passed authorising the admission of British Columbia into the Canadian federation. The provisions of the British North America Act were extended to the new province; an annual subsidy of $35,000 was set apart, and 80 cents granted to each head of the population, which then was estimated at 60,000. The most important stipulation in the terms of union with the new province was the obligation on the part of the Dominion to secure the commencement simultaneously, "within two years after the date of the union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as should be selected east of the Rocky Mountains towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; and further to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of the union." This line, we need scarce say, is not built yet, though it has had a prodigious catastrophe, resulting in the wreck of a great party, as shall be told further on. The Hon. William Joseph Trutch was appointed lieutenant-governor of the newly acquired province. The prosperity of Ontario was now developing in bounds, and Hon John Sandfield Macdonald, with the strange daring that had more than once led him upon the rocks, appropriated a large sum of the public funds for railway purposes without the consent of the legislature. A storm arose, and the premier could not withstand it. His enemies thundered their censure, and his friends dropped off. He resigned in December, and the governor asked Mr. Edward Blake to take his place. One of the first acts of the new provincial government was the offering of $5,000 reward for the apprehension of the murderers Riel and Lepine, one of whom at least has since met his deserts. Sir George Cartier had made common cause with Monseigneur Taché in shielding Riel, who was for the time, but not till he had sought parliamentary honours, induced to leave the country.

The last session of the first Dominion parliament opened on the 11th of April, 1872. The most important question was the clause of the Washington treaty to which we have reverted, Mr. Blake excelling himself in clever argument, sarcasm, and special pleading in his attack upon the measure. A question of much interest was the New Brunswick "School Bill," which had passed the legislature of that province, in May, of the previous year. The New Brunswick Act, in brief, provided for the establishment of free non-sectarian schools, which were to be taken out of the hand of the Jacks-of-all-trades, administered under government supervision, and supported by municipal taxation and a grant from the provincial legislature. A wise measure, however, was marred by blemishes affixed by a bigotry that made a triumph of reason an engine of injustice, gross and contemptible. The question, through the local constituencies, became not one between the old and barbarous plan of education, and the new system, but between protestant and catholic. The catholic priesthood became alarmed, and saw the hand of Satan guiding the new movement. The free-school people affected to see something nearly as bad on the other side, the Pope resisting the spread of education and thought. The priest was over fearful, the free-school champion was over zealous. The most with which the former is to be charged is extravagant dread, and a profusion of evil prophecy that he came forward himself, in time, to falsify; but against the latter there is a much less creditable count. They studded the new law with provisions, called by some one "millinery regulations," deliberately intended to insult and harass the Roman catholics, while one politician,* who is now, thanks to the unfortunate system of party which rules everything in this country from the bench to the buck-saw, a judge in New Brunswick, carried his unmanly bigotry so far as to declare on the hustings, that he had no feeling in common with Roman catholics, and did not want their votes. Such a spirit was odious enough in the campaign, but it was carried into the bill, and provided that no teacher should wear crosses, badges or garbs pertaining to any exclusive order; the object being to exclude religious of the Roman church from the work of teaching. It was while the law remained in this intolerable state, that the two prominent Roman catholics from New Brunswick in the Canadian legislature sought to have the obnoxious measure set aside. In May, therefore, Mr. Costigan moved a set of resolutions praying for the disallowance of the act, in which he was strongly seconded by Mr. Timothy Anglin. The following session he moved, "that the government should advise his excellency to disallow the acts passed by the New Brunswick legislature," which was carried; though the question remained open for several years afterwards. The next year again he moved for "an address to her Majesty praying her to cause an act to be passed amending the British North America Act, 1867, by providing that every religious denomination in New Brunswick shall continue to possess and enjoy all such rights with regard to their schools as they possessed and enjoyed at the time of the passage of the said Act." This resolution was withdrawn, though Mr. Costigan was unceasing in his exertions from session to session, till his desires were virtually accomplished by the amendments to the New Brunswick act which expunged the obnoxious regulations. In the early stages of the agitation, as we have seen, Sir John was in office, and during this time Mr. Costigan had the heartiest support from Mr. Anglin; but he stood alone in the struggle when the reformers came to power, when Mr. Anglin was elevated to the Chair, and agitation on the measure menaced his salary and perquisites. The New Brunswick legislature very properly resisted the attempts at Ottawa to set aside legislation which it felt it was competent to enact; and Hon. (now Judge) William Wedderburn, one of the most powerful and brilliant speakers in Canada, moved a series of resolutions in defence of the law, asserting the exclusive authority of the provincial legislature over the question, and resolving that its jurisdiction or powers should not be impaired or abridged without an appeal to the electors at the polls; and that without the consent of the local body the imperial parliament or the parliament of Canada ought not to interfere. Meanwhile the priests had refused to permit Catholic children to be taught in the "godless" institutions, and the parents were burthened with the double expense of paying the municipal tax to maintain the public schools, from which they derived no benefit, and of supporting the separate schools to which no contribution was made from the provincial funds. The bishops and their clergy found themselves obliged by conscience to refuse paying the public school-tax; but the officer seized a horse and carriage, or any chattel that he could lay hands upon, and went his way. It is related that the cow of a certain priest was seized five times for the tax, some pious parishioner as often "bidding in" the animal, and thus satisfying the law and the clerical conscience. But this state of affairs could not continue. The catholics began to groan at the double burthen put upon their shoulders. Then the priests had now and again paid a visit to the government schools, and found no pictures of Satan hanging upon the wall, nor heard any boy say that the name of our first parent was Protoplasm. The legislature, too, had shown a disposition to fair play by purging the school statute of insult and intolerance. Still the clergy remained aloof; but on their behalf leading citizens opened negotiations with the free-school authorities. Through the influence of Mr. (now Senator) Boyd and other prominent citizens in St. John, Bishop Sweeney capitulated, and in Fredericton, the capital, amalgamation was accomplished through the tireless exertions of Mr. Patrick McPeake, the leading Roman catholic in the city. Now while we have denounced the stain that bigotry put upon the school law as at first established, and admired the manly, able and uncompromising way in which Mr. Costigan battled for justice to his co-religionists, we must not be regarded as having the remotest sympathy with those who opposed non-sectarian schools upon principle. Ten years ago he who visited a parish school, from which God had not been banished, saw an institution seething with disorder, which was ever pouring a stream of youth upon the country, many of whom were more vulgar and vicious than if they had never seen the inside of the school walls. But it is different now; and the system of education enjoyed by the people of New Brunswick, would be a boon and a credit to any country. We could wish that of the system in this noble province we could say as much; though this is more than we dare to hope so long as it maintains the political taint.

Parliament prorogued on the 14th of June, and eight days afterwards the governor-general bade good bye to Canada. During his administration he had been raised to the peerage of the united kingdom with the title of Baron Lisgar, of Lisgar and Bailieborough, in the county of Cavan. While amongst us he won our good opinion and respect, though he neither flattered the people nor courted popularity, doing his duty with a courteous quiet dignity that pleased without effort. "His hospitality," says Professor Goldwin Smith, "was simply that of an English nobleman; it had no ulterior object, and as an example could do nothing but good." His successor was Frederick Temple Hamilton Blackwood, Earl of Dufferin, eldest son of Captain Price Blackwood, afterwards fourth Baron Dufferin and Clan-deboye, in the peerage of Ireland. The new governor was a man of some distinction in diplomacy and literature when he came amongst us. He had been under-secretary of state for war, and in the same capacity at the Indian office. He went to Syria as commissioner of the crown, where he ended the turmoil between the Christians and the natives. "He succeeded," says Mr. Stewart, "in mastering the details of this delicate mission; and not only satisfactorily arranged the Turkish troubles, but also compromised matters between the French and the warlike Druses. He gave a constitution to Lebanon, and we have here the first evidence of his ability as a statesman and diplomatist." If by letters in his own right he was not famous, he was distinguished through his ancestry. His mother was the author of "The Irish Emigrant," and other ballads, which, if not showing a deep poetical vein, contained a wealth of feeling, and many passages of tender, melancholy pathos. For an aunt, he had that pretty song-bird, the Hon. Mrs. Caroline Norton, whose sweet verse and bright eyes, scandal said, lured Lord Melbourne so often away from the cares of state. And through this siren he was connected with a name of still greater note, of whom a great poet has said:

" * * * Nature formed but one such man,
And broke the die in moulding Sheridan."

Lord Dufferin was educated at Eton and Oxford, and in 1850 was created an English baron. He was not long amongst us when it was found that the proverbial gift of his countrymen sat upon his tongue. In making speeches he could outdo our most confirmed orators; and in this respect his example was not good. If a governor-general could only, by his example, help to curtail the platform trade, he might well feel that his vice-regal mission had not been fruitless, and that he had not been born in vain. But it is not encouraging in a political country like this, where the tendency is to an epidemic of speech, to have a viceroy appear among us with this running at the mouth. Perhaps, but for this never-failing eloquence on every subject from a hot-water tankard to the constitution, it might be said that Earl Dufferin's administration was delightful. He possessed a warm sympathetic heart, and took a genuine interest in the welfare and aspirations of our people; and in return, there sprang up among us for him, a deeper and kindlier feeling of regard, than had ever before been entertained for a Canadian governor. Everywhere the viceroy and his great-hearted wife, the countess, went, they stirred the feelings of all by the genuine and hearty way in which they sympathized with, and entered into the feelings and aspirations of, those they visited. When they departed from our shores a void was left in the hearts of our people that it would be hard to fill.

The first parliament of Canada, having lived out the full term of its constitutional life, was dissolved on the 15th of July. The elections came off through the summer and early autumn, and the government found itself confronted by staunch opposition. The ghost of poor Scott, murdered in the North-West, rose against it; the Washington treaty "was shaken in the face of the country;" the gigantic railway-building, a duty to which the country had been pledged, was declared by the opposition to be a mad and impossible scheme; and the reform party in Ontario was made sturdy by the strength of Mr. Blake and the provincial ministry. The government came shattered, though not defeated, out of the contest. Sir Francis Hincks was worsted in South Brant, but Vancouver, British Columbia, offered the worthy knight her seat, which he accepted. Sir George Cartier was put to flight in Montreal east, but was welcomed to the arms of Provencher, Manitoba. Ontario declared herself hostile chiefly because the government had failed to punish Scott's murderers; Quebec refused her usual support because a full amnesty had not been granted. The dignity of the archbishop was at stake—though resting upon an absurdity and a misunderstanding—and that was of more importance than the cruel and wicked shedding of a fellow creature's blood. There once was a commandment—but it was under the Jewish dispensation!—though written upon stone by the finger of God, which said, "Thou shalt not kill"; but Sir George Cartier, and his French supporters, and Bishop Taché, and his priests and the faithful, blotted out that old edict, and put in its stead, "Thou shalt not dishonour the promise of a bishop." Notwithstanding the defections, a count of forces after the contest was ended satisfied Sir John that his government had an ample working majority. In October, the Ontario legislature passed a resolution prohibiting dual representation; so that Messrs. Blake and Mackenzie were compelled to choose between the provincial and general parliaments. Naturally, their ambition, patriotism, cupidity, and any other quality they may have possessed, found stronger attraction in the wider sphere and larger flesh-pots. Their choice necessitated a reconstruction of the provincial government, and Mr. Blake suggested to the lieutenant-governor that Mr. Mowat ought to be invited to lead the ministry. The lure was too strong for the judge, and he left the bench. Whatever of public immorality there was in this proceeding, Mr. Blake, at all events, was the seducer. From that day to this, Mr. Mowat has held the leadership of the Ontario government, and though his administration has not been brilliant, it has in many important respects been efficient and honest; if the adjective can be applied to a system somewhat subservient to the ends of party. Towards the close of the year M. Joly, leader of the opposition in the Quebec legislature, moved for a commission of inquiry into certain charges made against M. Cauchon, the local member for Montmorency, and whom we have also met in the Canadian parliament. The inquiry revealed that this member had, while occupying a seat in the local house, been a secret contractor with the provincial government in connexion with the Beauport lunatic asylum. To avoid expulsion M. Cauchon resigned; but the same moral sentiment that had so zealously shielded murder, now condoned corruption; and he was straightway elected again. Early in the following year, several important changes took place in the Canadian ministry, the most prominent of these being the acceptance of the portfolio of finance by the Hon. S. L. Tilley in place of Sir Francis Hincks, who had grown tired of official worry, and longed for the calm of private life. Dr. Tupper succeeded to the office of Mr. Tilley as head of the department of Customs. The new parliament opened on the 5th of March, 1873. Prince Edward Island had got over her little tiff, had reascned out the question of union, grown sorry over her stubbornness, and asked to be admitted into the federation. A measure was promptly prepared to give effect to the wish, and was forwarded to the imperial parent, who, of course, held the right of giving the daughter away. The debt of the little island was placed at $4,701,050; and interest at 5 per cent. per annum was to be paid from time to time on the difference between that sum and the actual amount of the provincial debt. An annual subsidy of $30,000 was granted, and the eighty cents for each head of the population which the census of 1871 showed to be 94,021. In the midst of the routine labours of the house, one day, a member arose, with face pale, and flung a bomb upon the floor which convulsed the parliament and the country.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE GOVERNMENT AND SIR HUGH ALLAN.

IT will be remembered that one of the terms under which British Columbia consented to enter confederation was that the central government should construct, within ten years, a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Two wealthy companies composed of superior business-men were formed, the one the Inter-Oceanic, at the head of which was Mr. D. L. Macpherson, the other the Canada Pacific, the president of which was Sir Hugh Allan. As the session of 1872 drew near, the air was full of rumours concerning these two organizations, opponents of the government affirming that Sir Hugh Allan was to get the contract, that his company was largely composed of Americans, that the road would be made tributary to American commerce, that all this was an outrage upon the country, and that 'he motto should be "Canada for the Canadians." Parliament met and the legislature granted a charter to both companies, authorizing the government to enter into contract with either, or with an amalgamation of the two, or, if they should see fit, to grant a royal charter to a new and distinct company. We need not repeat that to the construction of the railroad the country was by honour and by stipulation bound ; and for this purpose the legislature had agreed to grant 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000 to any company that would build the line. The project was not alone one of national importance, but was the most gigantic undertaking up to that time, or since, known to Canada. The grant made by parliament appeared enormous and was, therefore, tempting to the eye of those who may have had but little conception of the vast task of building a road across the rugged breast of a continent; so that it became the duty of government to give ear only to persons upon whose wisdom, experience and integrity they could rely, and whose commercial standing was such that they would be able to obtain the entrée into the money markets of the world for the prosecution of the work. On the 14th of June the session closed. Parliament was dissolved on the 8th of July, and from the 15th of the same month till the 12th of October the country was plunged into an election contest. An engrossing topic with the ministry was the railway, which it was felt should be begun as early as possible, as skilful engineers hinted that every day of the term allowed would be required to link ocean with ocean. The cry against "Sir Hugh and his Americans" had waxed louder in the meantime, but Sir John, from the first, expressed himself hostile to outside aid in building the line. Sir George Cartier, who frequently examined great questions through the eyes of somebody else, followed the lead of his chief and confirmed his opposition to "Yankees" with an oath. It was Sir John's desire now to get the two companies amalgamated, and to this end negotiations were opened; but the ambitions of the two presidents were irreconcilable, Sir Hugh claiming that his interests were of such magnitude that it was proper he should have the presidency, Mr. Macpherson holding that the question in dispute ought to be settled by the shareholders. Union having been found impossible, Sir John announced that the government would avail itself of the legislation of the past session and endeavour to form a new company. Sir Hugh now dropped his American associates and leagued himself with a number of Canadian gentlemen of high standing, and large means and experience. On this organization the government looked with favour in consideration of the high integrity, the financial ability, and the credit possessed by its members. The leading member was Sir Hugh Allan, the owner of the proud fleet of ocean steamers which bears his name, a gentleman of vast energy and enterprise, and possessing advantages, by the extent of his capital and his credit in the European money-market, not held by any other person that offered to undertake the work. The duty of the government was to close the contract at the earliest moment, to treat with those who were best qualified to do the work ; and so, after some consideration, issued the charter, appointing Sir Hugh president.

Parliament met in due course. Ministers announced that a new and powerful company was now ready to commence the great work, and that all needed was the sanction of the legislature. So gigantic had seemed the task to which the Dominion had committed itself, that the large bulk of the house, now learning that there was a body of responsible men actually ready to go on with the work, regarded the fact as a brilliant triumph for the government. Ministers began to rejoice in the work of their hands, and some of their opponents admitted with grudging grace that, under the circumstances, perhaps as good an agreement had been made as was possible. But then came out of the political sky a whisper that set the heart of opposition bounding, that brought light to its eye. This "small voice" said: "Doom is hanging over the ministry ; soon the bolt shall fall." The work of the session went on, the ministers, with buoyant hearts and sunny faces, dreaming of no evil to come. Their opponents made no unusual sign, save, perhaps, that of late they had appeared less factious and more reserved than usual. Sometimes, indeed, one spectator has recorded, a prominent reformer would steal an ominous glance across to the treasury benches, and then resume his work in a preoccupied way, as if "there was something in the wind." At last arrived the 2nd day of April. A sort of calm had seemed to have fallen upon the house. Some members were writing at their desks, others lounged in their chairs, or read the newspapers. The treasury benches were full ; the speaker sat in the chair, and pages flitted across the floor with notes. Sir John Macdonald was sitting at his own desk, one leg across the other, and leaning his head against his hand. He gave a "barely perceptible" start—Mr. Lucius Seth Huntington, with pale face, was standing at his place, and had begun to read from a paper the following motion:—

"That he, the said Lucius Seth Huntington, is credibly informed and believes that he can establish by satisfactory evidence, that in anticipation of the legislation of last session, as to the Pacific Railway, an agreement was made between Sir Hugh Allan, acting for himself, and certain other Canadian promoters, and G. W. McMullen, acting for certain United States capitalists, whereby the latter agreed to furnish all the funds necessary for the construction of the contemplated railway, and to give the former a certain percentage of interest, in consideration of their interest and position, the scheme agreed upon being ostensibly that of a Canadian company with Sir Hugh Allan at its head,—

"That the government were aware that these negotiations were pending between the said parties,—

"That, subsequently, an understanding was come to between the government, Sir Hugh Allan and Mr. Abbott, one of the members of the honourable house of commons of Canada, that Sir Hugh Allan, and his friends should advance a large sum of money for the purpose of aiding the elections of ministers and their supporters at the ensuing general election, and that he and his friends should receive the contract for the construction of the railway,—

"That accordingly Sir Hugh Allan did advance a large sum of money for the purpose mentioned, and at the solicitation and under the pressing instances of the ministers,—

"That part of the moneys expended by Sir Hugh Allan in connection with the obtaining of the act of incorporation and charter were paid to him by the United States capitalists under the agreement with him,—

“That a committee of seven members be appointed to enquire into all the circumstances connected with the negotiations for the construction of the Pacific Railway, with the legislation of last session on the subject, and with the granting of the charter to Sir Hugh Allan and others, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and with instructions to report in full the evidence taken before, and all proceedings of, said committee.”

Sometimes, as he read, he paused and cast his eye about him to note the effect of his disclosures. Some sat with heads thrust forward, eagerly drinking every word; others with a stolid air, and a look of stony indifference. Not a few there were with the light of triumph in their eye; and some felt, or assumed to feel, the most unbounded horror. But as the member's eye rested upon one figure, he became abashed, and his voice grew timid. This was the prime minister who sat with a face as inscrutable as the Sphynx, betraying no sign of fear or any show of anger. Once Mr. Huntington caught his eye, and saw there the blaze of scorn; and contempt was upon his lip. Having read his motion he sat down, amid a “silence deep as death; and the boldest held his breath for a time.” It would have given relief to this agony of silence had the accusing member made any explanation, or spoken any word; or had any other member of the house asked a question or offered comment. The accuser was not as one who had performed some deed of wondrous valour. “He had spoken,” says Mr. Stewart, “with some feeling, but it was the feeling of fear. It was as if he had chalked ‘No Popery’ on the wall and had then fled.” There is now no doubt that when Mr. Huntington made his charges, his authority was vague rumour; that he had not in his possession, nor had seen, the telegrams and documents which afterwards came to light; and that his motion was thrown out as a feeler, with the hope of bringing some member of the government to his feet, and making statements which might serve as a clue to the supposed wrong-doing, or lend colour to the allegations. Every eye was now turned upon the prime minister, but he sat at his desk as if he had been a figure of stone; he uttered no word, and made no sign. The motion was seconded without comment, was put to the house, and, out of that sickening stillness, came one hundred and seven "nays," and seventy-six "yeas." A long breath of relief was drawn; the silence found its tongue, and a continuous buzz-buzz prevailed for many minutes. Then adjournment.

A meeting of the cabinet was hastily called, Sir John informing his colleagues that the slander must be promptly and boldly met. Next night, we may be sure, there was little sleep for the premier. He was aware that certain transactions between members of the ministry and Sir Hugh Allan were susceptible of being distorted into a form corresponding with the charges made by Mr. Huntington, and that the government would have a serious task to put the case in its true light before the country; but he was resolved to face the charge firmly and challenge the accusers, knowing that he had less to fear from a thorough exposé than from the insinuations of opponents barely seasoned with distorted fact. Looking more wearied and anxious than he had ever appeared in that house before, he took his place the following day and, rising, offered the following resolution, which was carried:—"On motion of the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, that a select committee of five members (of which committee the mover shall not be one) be appointed by this house to enquire into and report upon the several matters contained and stated in a resolution moved on Wednesday, the 2nd of April, instant, by the Hon. Mr. Huntington, member for the county of Shefford, relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway, with power to send for persons, papers and records; to report from time to time, and to report the evidence from time to time, and, if need be, to sit after the prorogation of Parliament."

The members named for the committee were Hon. Messrs. Blake, Blanchet, Dorion, Macdonald (Pictou), and Cameron (Cardwell).

To guard against the admission of unreliable testimony, it was provided that the commission be authorized to examine witnesses upon oath; but as the committee, as such, had no power to so examine, a measure called the Oaths Bill was promptly introduced and passed, conferring upon the commissioners that authority. In this, however, parliament transcended its powers, and the act was disallowed by her majesty on the advice of the law officers of the crown. While the fate of the bill was unknown the commission met, and on the 5th of May decided, in view of the absence of Sir George Cartier, and the Hon J. J. C. Abbott, and the impossibility of the investigation being carried on in a proper manner without opportunity being afforded these gentlemen of being present and hearing the testimony adduced, that it was advisable that the committee adjourn until Wednesday, the 2nd of July, if parliament should be, on such date, in session. According to the customs of Lynch law, nothing is so absurd as the plea that the accused should be present at his own trial to offer his defence; and the opposition grew wroth at the decision to stay proceedings till the impugned members returned and had an opportunity of defending themselves. Some time after this, Sir John waited on the governor-general, and advised adjournment, with a view to meeting and prorogation, on the 13th of August. Lord Dufferin saw that the suggestion was good; the spring had well advanced, and it was to the interest of members to be at their homes; the business of the session had been ended; the presence of the legislature could not promote the work of the commission which might go on taking the evidence; and he decided to accept the prime minister's advice. Upon this understanding, Sir John proceeded to the house, and from his place announced in distinct terms, that parliament would be prorogued on the 13th of August, "that the re-assembling would be pro forma, that no business would be done beyond receiving the report of the committee, which could then be printed with the evidence, and go before the country; that the members would not be required to return, and that only the Speakers of the two houses would need to be in their places." All this the house seemed to clearly understand, and no opposition was offered to the arrangement. Mr. Blake expressed the opinion that the commission might go on taking evidence from the rising of the house till the meeting of the regular session in February, forgetting that the powers of a parliamentary commission expire with prorogation. Mr. Holton said he believed a quorum would be necessary to receive the report; and muttered between his teeth that he and a quorum would be there. Sir John, in reply, observed that if a quorum were considered necessary, a sufficient number of members for that purpose could be found in the neighbourhood of the capital. On a distinct understanding of the facts as above related, the house was adjourned; after which members returned to their homes, and the opposition abandoned themselves to falsehood and conspiracy. Instead of a quiet meeting with the two speakers, only, present, or a quorum, with the 13th of August appeared the opposition in full strength, intrigue in their hearts, falsehood upon their tongues. And when asked for what purpose they had mustered en masse, they answered: "We didn't understand that the meeting was to be pro forma; we thought a full attendance was desirable." The intention was—since the ministry, abiding by the terms of adjournment, was at a serious disadvantage in having but a few of its supporters at the capital—to overthrow the government by the force of numbers. And, certainly, unlike men of honour, they chuckled at the trap into which they believed the government had fallen.

During the period between adjournment and the 13th of August, the governor-general was making a tour of the maritime provinces, and filling public halls and school-houses with his infinite eloquence. During that summer recess many strange tidings fell upon the public ear. First came the announcement that the Oaths Bill had been disallowed, and that the work of the commission was at a standstill. It is not to be wondered at that some of the opposition screamed out that this was the doings of Sir John; had God sent a bolt from heaven and smitten the five commissioners, their inclinations for the moment would have been to believe that the premier was in some measure responsible for the taking off. On receiving notice of the disallowance, the governor put himself in correspondence with the prime minister. The commission would meet in a few days, and it was desirable that the public mind should be satisfied as to the truth or falsity of the heinous charges. Sir John said there was one way that the end sought could be attained, and that was by issuing a royal commission to the committee, which could then go on as had been originally arranged, placing the evidence before parliament which might take whatever steps it chose upon receiving the same. This is the only practical way lying open now, wrote the prime minister, to probe the facts of the case. Lord Dufferin grasped at the suggestion, and acted upon it without delay. "No one can doubt," he said, "that for the purpose for which the committee was originally constituted, its conversion into a commission can make no practical difference. As a commission it will take evidence; and as a committee it will report upon that evidence to the house." Armed with the governor-general's authority, Sir John wrote to each of the five members stating that, as the oaths' bill had been disallowed, it was his intention to issue to the committee a royal commission. The acceptance of the commission, he pointed out, would accomplish the object originally in view, and hasten the work. But Messrs. Blake and Dorion, the two reform members, refused to act on the ground that they would be under the control of the accused parties. This view, in a constitutional sense, was undoubtedly correct, though it was subsequently affirmed in the house that the crown, not the ministry, had issued the commission, and had control of the enquiry. But this ground at once becomes untenable when we reflect that the viceroy is bound to take the advice of his council, and that during the sitting of the commission some of the impeached ministers were the trusty advisers of the crown, which refused to consider them guilty, or unworthy of confidence, till their guilt had been proven. This objection then might well have been regarded as fatal, were the commission possessed of judicial and final powers; but its functions were only inquisitorial; it was merely to collect evidence and report to the house, which might accept, reject, or ignore the same, as it saw fit. There was, unfortunately, no other way, owing to the unwise tying up of our powers by the act of the foreign state, by which the matter could be probed; and under such circumstances the duty of Mr. Blake was to have come out of the clouds and surrendered to the real and the practicable.

On the 4th of July, certain information contained in the Montreal Herald fell upon the public ear like a clap of thunder. This information comprised a number of letters and telegrams sent to one C. M. Smith, of Chicago, a banker, and one Geo. McMullen, of Picton, who seemed at first to be a speculator or the representative of American capitalists, but who subsequently appeared as a blackleg. In this correspondence the history of Sir Hugh Allan's exertions towards obtaining the railway charter is set forth, the expenses he had incurred in pushing his scheme,—expenses which he declared exceeded $300,000 in gold—and certain relations with Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier. At once the hostile and the hasty swallowed the statements, and concluded that the enormous sum which Sir Hugh alleged he had paid away had gone into the hands of the ministers for corrupting the constituencies at the late elections. On the following day, an affidavit dealing with these charges, made by Sir Hugh, appeared in the Montreal Gazette. It was a wet blanket flung upon the previous days' story, and depressed, sadly enough, the spirits of the opposition. We need not here go into the details of this statement. The deponent admitted that there were many inaccuracies.

racies in his hastily-written business-letters; but the statement with which we are concerned, and which at once vindicated the innocence of ministers of the crimes inferred from the allegations in the letters, was as follows. ". . . In these and similar ways I expended sums of money approaching in amount those mentioned in the letters, as I conceive I had a perfect right to do; but I did not state in those letters, nor is it the fact, that any portions of those sums of money were paid to the members of the government, or were received by them or on their behalf, directly or indirectly, as a consideration, in any form, for any advantage to me in connection with the Pacific railway contract." So far then, the accusations against the ministry had fallen to the ground, and Mr. Huntington's allegations were regarded by a large bulk of the people as reckless slanders. And so the opinion would have stood had not the blackmailer, McMullen, come forward with what purported to be a concise and circumstantial statement of the corrupt relations of the government with Sir Hugh Allan, in which he put forward inferences as facts, and assumptions as transactions happening under his own eyes, bringing his disclosures to an end with a number of stolen telegrams, containing requests from Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier, to Sir Hugh, for certain sums of money. There was no indication as to the objects for which the money was intended, or upon what conditions it had been received; but once more the hostile and the rash were assured that it had been obtained from Sir Hugh in consideration of the sale of the Pacific railway charter to him and his American friends; and that Mr. Huntington had alleged the whole truth and nothing but the truth. And we must leave one and both to nurse their charitable opinion till we reach the stage in our narrative for another explanation.

The governor-general had reached Prince Edward Island when newspapers containing the McMullen narrative came to hand. He was considerably startled, Mr. Stewart tells us, at reading the correspondence, and at once sent for Messrs. Tilley and Tupper who were at the time on the Island on official business ; but both these gentlemen assured him that satisfactory explanations would be made in due course ; and his lordship accepted the declaration as a confirmation of his hopes. He had before setting out upon his tour provided for prorogation on the 13th of August, by commission, but now felt that the case had assumed such a shape as to demand other arrangements. On the morning of the 13th, his excellency was in the capital, and within a few hours after his arrival was waited upon by the premier, who, on behalf of the ministry, tendered the advice that parliament should be prorogued as originally agreed upon. His lordship went over the grounds put forth by Sir John, and found they were good ; and since he still had confidence in the prime minister and his colleagues, nothing remained for him but to be guided by their counsel, as he cheerfully was. He consented to the arrangement, but upon the condition that parliament should meet again as soon as was consistent with the reasonable convenience of members, after say six or eight weeks ; to which proposal Sir John gave his hearty consent. In the meantime the opposition, or the "party of punishment," as they were not unwilling to be styled, had resolved on a course of their own. While his excellency was in the maritime provinces, they had adopted the manly and honourable course of endeavouring, by stealth, to prejudice and poison his mind against his ministers. A member who apparently was not in the habit of allowing dignity or a sense of manly pride to stand in the way of his inclinations, collected a number of newspapers, containing the charges against the ministry, which he enclosed and directed to his excellency ; but they were returned to him unopened. On the morning of prorogation, the governor learnt that a large body of members of parliament was awaiting an audience ; and he was at no little loss to guess what could be their mission. His speculation was soon put at an end by Mr. (now Sir) Richard J. Cartwright, who introduced the delegation, and then presented a memorial signed by ninety-two members praying that his excellency might not prorogue parliament until the house of commons had had an opportunity "of taking such steps as it may deem necessary with reference to this important matter." Of course this request was an assumption that the governor either did not know, or was unwilling to perform, his duty; but gross though this inference was, his excellency answered the delegation with his usual courtesy, refusing promptly and firmly, however, to grant their request. This was an utter collapse for the opposition hope. They had nursed their plot through the hot summer, and now that the hour had come when it was to be put to account, the figure of the governor must rise and thwart them. Only thirty-five ministerialists were at the capital, but the reformers, as we have seen, were there in force, "an eager, expectant and exultant throng. Their faces showed determination, but no mercy; their actions convinced the ministry that they would give no quarter. For weeks they had waited for this moment; and now the hour had arrived." *

They set up a cry of disappointment and rage; and their newspapers loaded the governor-general and the prime minister with libel. Among those flying with the storm, regardless of their dignity, was seen the figure of Mr. Edward Blake. He had sat apart for many weeks feeding his mind on solitary meditation, and when he met his brethren at Ottawa assured them that he had discovered at least two courses by which parliament could confer the power, upon a committee of its own members, to administer oaths. One of these ways the Earl of Kimberly afterwards stated, "would be beyond the powers of the parliament of the Dominion;" the other, also, was proved to be unconstitutional, Sir John pointing out that Mr. Blake had misread the case occurring during the administration of William Pitt, which he had taken as an analogy. Meanwhile, the opposition party, through the ministrations of its orators and press, continued to sound the charges against the ministry up and down the land.

Reformers having refused to sit as royal commissioners, Sir John suggested to the governor the expediency of issuing a commission to three or more judges of the land, whose position would remove them from the suspicion of partiality in conducting the enquiry; and acting on the advice, which he believed to be good, his excellency chose the honourable judges Day, Polette, and Gowan, who promptly began the work assigned them. It would be too much to expect that any ministerial arrangement could satisfy the opposition; and it is hardly to be wondered at that before the new commission met at all it was loaded with slander by the reform press and its members, and characterized as the creature of the prime minister. An atmosphere, more poisonous than that wind which "breathed in the face" of Sennacherib's army, now floated over the province: the aroma from a corrupt ministry, and from tainted ermine. Mr. Mackenzie, who sometimes himself, does not hesitate at exaggeration, at least when writing political biographies, did not believe that either party would knowingly utter falsehood upon examination, and, therefore, regarded the terrors of the oath unnecessary; but even Mr. Blake shuddered, inwardly, as he thought of such men as McMullen coming into the box and testifying upon their "honour." Yet he, no more than any of his brethren, was satisfied with the judges upon the new commission, though it was impossible for him to condescend to the allegation that these gentlemen would falter in their duty. But his choice lay between smirching the honour of the commissioners, and accepting their appointment as good, unless, indeed, he was more anxious that formality should be observed, than that the charges against the government should be thoroughly investigated. Yes, answers Mr. Blake, that is very well, but what if the ministry tied up the hands of the judges, and thwarted enquiry in fatal directions? And our answer is this: The commission was held in the light of day; seats were provided for the reporters; Mr. Huntington was requested to furnish a list of his witnesses, and invited to come forward and question these as he would; advertisements were put in the papers calling upon any persons who knew aught of the case to come forward; a large array of witnesses for and against the ministry was present; they were submitted to the most searching cross-examination by members of both political parties, and questions were asked by the reform side, and answers given, which would not have been tolerated in any court of law, without challenge. In what way, then, pray, Mr. Blake, were the hands of the judges tied? Whence, pray, reformers of lesser dignity, came the taint on the ermine? But had the judges been base as Jeffreys himself, the terms of the commission were fatal to partiality. Lord Dufferin distinctly, at the beginning, traced out the chart by which the judges were to be guided. "Your duty is not judicial, but inquisitorial," were his instructions; they were not to pronounce, to condemn, or to exculpate, but to collect evidence and report the same to the commons without comment: to the commons that might accept or reject that testimony as it chose. And as instructed, so they did. They furnished the evidence without comment, though they stated, as they had the right to do, that anybody who cared to learn their private opinion, might have it. Many sought that opinion; it was that there was little in the evidence to corroborate the charges preferred by Mr. Huntington. Now it might have been supposed that in the interests of pure government, the gentleman who made the grave charges against the administration in his place in the house, would have been found among the host of witnesses called; but he came not—though he furnished the the names of witnesses to the commission. And it might have been supposed that McMullen, who had levied blackmail on Sir Hugh Allan, rifled cabinets, stolen telegrams, and steeped himself to the lips in dishonour for the sake, also, of pure government would have come to judgment, but he appeared not;

neither came the Chicago banker, C. M. Smith, whom it had been alleged Sir Hugh Allan had "fleece" to buy up the ministry, and seduce the constituencies. These gentlemen remained away, and listened from behind the doors to the evidence, tossing their caps in glee when any testimony was adduced that they believed lent colour to their allegation. But it is sickening work to wade through this page of history, and we pass on.

The commission finished its work, and as the 23rd of October drew near, the political combatants girded on their swords. Sir Hugh Allan returned from England; but before the meeting of the session had resigned the charter. On the 27th of October the memorable debate began. Mr. Mackenzie made, as he always does, a speech that one who hears is likely to remember. Mr. Mackenzie is a large dealer in facts, which some may call "dry," but which we designate as "hard;" and to these he has the faculty of giving a bias which it is frequently impossible to detect. His speech against Sir John and the ministry was perhaps the ablest, in its way, that he has ever delivered. The argument was strong and was poured out like some stinging, dissolving acid. In amendment to the second paragraph of the ministerial speech, he moved:—"And we have to acquaint his excellency that, by their course in reference to the investigation of the charges preferred by Mr. Huntington, in his place in this house, and under the facts disclosed in the evidence laid before us, his excellency's advisers have merited the severe censure of this house."

Mr. (now Judge) James Macdonald, of Pictou, followed in a speech of great power, moving as a second amendment:—"And we desire to assure his excellency, that, after consideration of the statements made in the evidence before us, and while we regret the outlay of money by all political parties at parliamentary elections, and desire the most stringent measures to put an end to the practice, we at the same time beg leave to express our continued confidence in his excellency's advisers, and in their administration of public affairs."

As the debate progressed, the premier sat indifferently at his desk, sometimes smiling, now with the light of scorn in his eye; but as the days wore on, and he knew the tempter had been among his followers, and that some had fallen, a shade of anxiety was seen in his face; never fear. It was not that he regretted the loss of power, but it wrung him to the heart's core that any of his own friends should doubt his honour. Yet like a brave man, who in the hour of such sore trial, turns to his conscience, the premier bore with calm fortitude a condemnation which he knew came not from conviction but from interest, and soothed himself with the assurance that time heals all sores, and that the day would come when his country would commute its sentence, and acknowledge the injustice it had done him now. It was now necessary that he should be sacrificed, his honour assailed, his name smirched, that his opponents might triumph. Woe to the man whose honour is cast in the scale against the interest of a political party, ravenous for power! On the sixth day of the debate, and after the commons had expended most of its oratorical strength, Sir John arose, amidst the deafening cheers of those who having known him honourable, honest, manly and true, through the dark day, and in the sunshine, believed in him still. The anxiety upon his cheek was replaced for the moment by something like a gleam of hope, as the house rang with the plaudits of his followers; but the old expression soon returned, though the language seemed trustful, and he seemed as one who addressed a court while standing upon his own funeral pyre. Yet as the reader will see, who peruses the speech,* there was a manifest hopefulness of tone as point after point in the allegations was met and overthrown. We need not refer to the speech in detail, contenting ourselves with a word as to the charge that the government had sold the Pacific railway charter to Sir Hugh Allan, in consideration of certain sums of money to be used in the elections. On this point let us hear Sir John himself. "The government never gave Sir Hugh Allan any contract that I am aware of. We never gave him a contract in which he had a controlling influence. We formed a committee of thirteen men, chosen carefully and painfully for the purpose of preventing Sir Hugh Allan from having any undue influence. We provided that no one on the board should hold more than one hundred thousand dollars of the stock. . . . Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only one more thing to say on this point: I put it to your own minds. There were thirteen gentlemen, Sir Hugh Allan and others, incorporated by that charter. That charter—study it, take it home with you. Is there any single power, privilege or advantage given to Sir Hugh Allan with that contract that has not been given equally to the other twelve? It is not pretended that any of the other twelve paid money for their positions. You cannot name a man of these thirteen that has got any advantage over the other, except that Sir Hugh Allan has his name down first on the paper. Can any one believe that the government is guilty of the charges made against them." This needs no amplification at our hands. But let us recall the charge—that Sir Hugh Allan had disbursed over $300,000 in gold in buying his way to the charter. That Sir Hugh spent enormous sums at the early stages of the proceeding we have no doubt; that he paid French lawyers and orators to go through the country, subsidized newspapers, and scattered money broadcast where influence was to be secured is almost certain; but that the government cared not for this, and was in no wise concerned, is proven by the fact that after all this lavish expenditure Sir John telegraphed to Sir George Cartier, that Sir Hugh Allan's terms, the terms to which he had been buying his way, could not be granted. The whole scheme came to an end; Sir Hugh's "powder and shot" had been wasted on the air; and the government formed a new and distinct company of its own. And how far from serving the interests of Sir Hugh in the new company was Sir John or the ministry, we learn from Mr. Tilley's statement, to the effect that when he was seeking for directors for the company from the lower provinces, Sir John's injunction was, "But take care that those you select be not men who will fall under the influence of Allan." Every step in the negotiation was made with a view to circumscribing the powers of Sir Hugh, as the government knew his ability in manipulation, and the power he held by reason of his influence in the money markets. If Sir Hugh chose to fling away his hundreds of thousands in buying influence through the province of Quebec that was no affair of the government. Money is the greatest power known to man, and those who have it use it to accomplish their ends. It is only a few days ago since a "railway magnate" passed through our province scattering gold; and in his progress bought up, it is estimated, over fifty newspapers. But we need not waste time. This much is as clear as day. If the government had been under obligation to Sir Hugh, if they had taken his money in lieu of their support in the railway scheme, he would have been the favoured one in the charter; but instead of this we find he is one man of thirteen, given the same amount of stock ($100,000), as each of the other thirteen receives, getting no preferences, save the presidency, which he would have obtained from the company itself, and that he is hedged in at every point by government restrictions. Madness itself could not suppose a bargain or an understanding in light of such facts, unless on the assumption that Sir Hugh Allan was an idiot; and with Sir Hugh alone, of the company, was the government charged with trafficking. One point, only, remains now to be disposed of. To what did the stolen telegrams, in which Sir John and other members of the government ask Sir Hugh Allan for certain sums of money, refer? Let us hear Sir John. He makes no attempt to deny that money was spent at the election. It was needed, and it was legitimately spent, as money is needed and spent at every election known to man under responsible government. "We were simply subscribing as gentlemen, while they were stealing as burglars," affirms Sir John. He found the Ontario government with its purse and its promises in the field against him, and he had to fight fire with fire; but never he says, was a dollar spent corruptly. This local government force was sprung upon him; he found the enemy strong at every point, and had to meet its strength with like strength. Sir Hugh Allan came forward and said that if the government had not had sufficient time among their friends to get what money they needed, he could advance them a certain sum. Promptly we may be sure was the offer accepted, with the understanding that friends of the government would do as they have always, whether properly or improperly, been asked to do, make up the amount of the loans, and other expenses. But this did not tie the government to Sir Hugh; already they had refused his overtures, and ended his hopes of the scheme for which he had disbursed his $300,000 in gold; in their succeeding relations they treated him as they did his twelve associates. Here then was the feature which the government's opponents called "bad:" accepting loans from a contractor in a public work. But we have shown that the act did not influence the course of the government in dealing with the lender in his relation to the contract; hence the charge of impropriety goes to the wall. Perhaps some will suggest "indiscretion" for impropriety. We shall not quarrel with whomsoever does so. One more point remains. Was it proper that the government should scatter all this money through the electorate? Is not that debauching the public mind? It is, we answer without hesitation, but the sin rests on the shoulders of the system which prevails in every country under responsible, and party government. Sir John simply did as his neighbours, no more, and nothing worse. At every election there are expenses, some light, and some vast, and these have to be borne by ministers and their friends. The spectacle may be pitiable, and it is pitiable, but it is true, and is a part of our system as much as the ballot itself. At the last general election, if the newspaper reporter, who attends to keyholes, is to be believed, Sir John gathered the manufacturers about him, and levied an election tax. Probably he did; and his reform friends were not behind him. The reformer as well as the tory, has his "fund" at election time, and he does not use it to make the electors purer and more independent. Once, indeed, he did move in this direction, when he levied a large sum to "put down corruption." The only difference between the conservative and his neighbour in this respect is that the latter sometimes goes in debt to bribe and corrupt, as we see by the post-election scandals with which men not over honest now and again regale the public nostril. We need not do more than say in conclusion, that every judge in the land, every impartial observer who has studied the story of the connection between the prime-minister and Sir Hugh, is forced to admit, that, while the accidental relations between the giver and the receiver of the railway charter, assumed, at the first, an aspect strongly suggestive of wrong-doing, that there remains little to prove that the conduct of Sir John, so far as he may be said to have personally profited by the affair, showed aught than fidelity to his public trust, or was other than that of a man of honour. This, too, is the verdict of the people who have repented of their harsh judgment and taken him back to favour. And it will be the verdict of history.

CHAPTER XXII.

MR. MACKENZIE'S ADMINISTRATION.

SIR JOHN MACDONALD'S attitude on the morrow of these disclosures, and in presence of the adverse judgment of the House and the country, was typical of the man. It was the expression of a stalwart courage, which blenched not in face of calumny and opposition, as well as of an unshaken confidence in himself and his government. This attitude he then and always afterwards maintained, despite what his enemies had charged him with, and whatever colour had been given to the circumstances brought to light in the relations between the heads of the Administration and Sir Hugh Allan. His speech in defence of his conduct is full of force and fire. Nor is it lacking in dignity, or in that moral tone, which gave no little effect to his words, of injured innocence. Here is the peroration of his address, after insisting that Sir Hugh Allan had contributed of his own volition to the election fund of the party, and that there was nothing in the Pacific Railway charter, conceding an undue privilege to that gentleman or to those in alliance with him, that might be construed as a corrupt bargain between the government and the projected construction company. "Mr. Speaker," said Sir John Macdonald, "I commit myself, the government commits itself, to the hands of this House, and far beyond the House, it commits itself to the country at large. We have faithfully done our duty. We have fought the battle of Confederation. We have fought the battle of Union. We have had party strife setting province against province, and, more than all, we have had in the greatest province, the preponderating province of the Dominion, every prejudice and sectional feeling that could be arrayed against us. I have been the victim of that conduct to a great extent; but I have fought the battle of Confederation, the battle of Union, the battle of the Dominion of Canada. I throw myself upon this House; I throw myself upon this country; I throw myself upon posterity; and I believe I know, that, notwithstanding the many failings in my life, I shall have the voice of this country and of this House rallying round me. And, sir, if I am mistaken in that, I can confidently appeal to a higher court—to the court of my own conscience, and to the court of posterity. I leave it with this House with every confidence. I am equal to either fortune. I can see past the decision of this House, either for or against me. I know—and it is no vain boast for me to say so, for even my enemies will admit that I am no boaster—that there does not exist in Canada a man who has given more of his time, more of his heart, more of his means, or more of his intellect and power, such as they may be, for the good of this Dominion of Canada.” Vain, however, was this appeal, and finding the struggle a wrestle with the inevitable, Sir John Macdonald, on the morning of the 5th of November, (1873), placed his resignation and that of his Ministry in the hands of the Governor-General. Later in the same day, he rose in his place in the House and announced that the Government had resigned, and that His Excellency had called upon Mr. Alexander Mackenzie to form a ministry. Then the great cloud of change rolls in, shutting from our sight the figure upon whom our eye so long had rested with admiration and pride; and a new crew appear upon the deck of the ship of State. Two days after Sir John’s resignation, the new premier was able to announce his ministry as follows:—

HON. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE	Premier and Min. Pub. Works.
“ A. A. DORION	- - - Minister of Justice.

" RICHARD W. SCOTT	-	-	-	-	(without portfolio).

Mr. Mackenzie was determined on a thorough cleansing of what the Opposition doubtless deemed the Augean stable, and asked for a dissolution, which was granted. If the reform newspapers were to be relied upon, a large number of members had bought their way to the legislature with Sir Hugh Allan's money; so by a new election, candidates would have an opportunity of judicious bribing with purer coin of the realm. There was not a superfluity of brotherly love in the new cabinet, for Mr. Blake could not hide, or probably did not care to hide, his dislike of Mr. Mackenzie; while Sir Richard Cartwright, who looked with no enamoured eye on responsible government, was rather out of his element among radical statesmen grown up from the trades. The lack of cordial relations between Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Blake, then as now, were due, we infer, to the leadership, which passed the latter because he could not bend to negotiation. If Mr. Blake has ever had a political intrigue, which we do not believe, then surely must it have been different from that of other men. We can imagine this singularly icy statesman treading the long winding-stair of a solitary tower, and, having reached the top which looks out into the star-lit night, carrying on an intrigue with his own half-mystical ambition. Never can our imagination picture him courting his colleagues, still less courting the people, for their preferences.

On the 2nd of July, the old parliament ceased to exist, and the two parties went to the polls. The reformers had no rigidly-defined policy to propound, their chief mission being to purify the country. They pledged themselves to keep faith with

British Columbia, but gave warning that they considered the construction of the Pacific Railway within the time specified impossible, and that they would not bind themselves to that portion of the contract. The other measures in the programme were not of first-rate importance. They included, however, the following useful measures: a readjustment of the franchise, and the taking of votes by ballot; a revision of the militia and insolvent laws; the qualification of members for the legislature; the creation of a Court of Appeal for the Dominion; the promotion of immigration; an improvement of the canal system, and the development of unoccupied territory. As well might one, standing upon the shore, expect to reason with the ocean, that has been lashed into fury by the storm, as expect Sir John to succeed in getting Canada, disturbed and startled by the alarming scandal which the reformers had unearthed, to listen to reason and give heed to his defence. She stopped her ears and turned away. The reformers swept the country, and Mr. Mackenzie, in the new parliament, found a majority of eighty at his back. We differ from Mr. Mackenzie in our view of many public questions, and have no great admiration for him as a writer, much less as a biographer painting a portrait under the coercion of party prejudice; nevertheless we do not hesitate to say that his influence upon the political life of Canada, has been good; that he was faithful to his trust; and above all according to his lights, strove to do his duty. We would like to be able to say that he was a popular administrator; but we cannot. He was out of sympathy with the spirit of our time; and the robust judgment of the young country, then at least, was against him. Cast-iron theories always hedged him in, and set bounds to his every impulse and plan; at last they grew so narrow as to become his coffin. A man who follows a doctrine has little of pliancy or compromise, and less of the disposition to be influenced by public opinion. His attitude reminds one of the captain on the lee shore who scorned the advice of his officers, went by the "Navigator's Guide," and put his vessel upon the rocks. But it is only ignorance or prejudice that would deny to Mr. Mackenzie a place amongst the foremost statesmen of his time. In and out of office he exhibited a tireless industry in examining and mastering every subject belonging to the public sphere; and those who have seen his inner life declare that while he held power he never lived an idle day. Of his policy of stubborn resistance to the popular will, he certainly was the heir rather than the arbiter; and if he ever desired to be free from the yoke of that power which dominated almost every important action of his administration, his escape from the Nemesis that haunted him was made after his opportunity had been lost, and when he never again could breathe the breath of confidence into the people. In later years his head rolled on the block to propitiate the policy of his master's making. Nor had the deposed leader any superabundant loyalty for the hand that cut off his head; he repaid his lucky rival with a support as frigid as the latter gave to him when he became prime minister. Too often the community is the measure of the man, the "village Hampden" seldom attaining to the stature of the giant; and if our colonial statesmen develop smaller mindedness in the political sphere than do British statesmen, the fault is perhaps rather the country's than their own. This much, however, is certain: From 1846 to 1852, Lord John Russell was prime-minister of England, with Palmerston as foreign secretary; but in 1855 the latter became premier, his former leader taking the colonial secretaryship; and the most amicable relations existed between the two statesmen. In 1835, the Duke of Wellington accepted the foreign secretaryship, under Peel, with cordial loyalty, bending to the wishes of his party; though the bluff old statesman was not without the opinion that his prowess in the council was only equalled by his skill in campaigns. British history abounds with similar instances, the leader of to-day becoming the subordinate of to-morrow, not regarding the change as a personal injury by the luckier rival, but as one of the fortunes of political war. One of Mr. Mackenzie's faults seems to have been a rather hard and unyielding manner, which he could, perhaps, no more control than if it had been dyspepsia; but many a one who had claims upon his courtesy came out of his presence more or less, adversely influenced by it. Such slight faults, however, help sometimes to make up a bill of assassination. But the change of heads did not make the reform atmosphere warmer. The party lost a leader whose blood was cold, and got something colder.

When Mr. Mackenzie assembled his forces at the Capital he found office a boisterous sea, where without a skilled helmsman the vessel of State is sure to find shipwreck. Mr. Mackenzie differed very much from Sir John Macdonald in his mode of administering affairs. He was disposed to promise little, his manner was formal and cold, and, as we have said, he rarely cultivated those little amenities which go far to make a cabinet minister popular. It was an irksome task with him to give a promise which he could not fulfil or to undertake anything he thought he could not carry out. It seemed a part of his policy to say very little, but to try and do a great deal. Sir John, on the other hand, had pursued a line of conduct quite the reverse of this. "With him nothing was impossible. He laid his finger on the map of British Columbia one day, and finding that it rested immediately on the spot marked Vancouver Island, he said, let that be the terminus of the Pacific Railway. What were mountain ranges or seas of mountains to him? It was an easy matter to promise. It was easy to send a thousand engineers into the field! It was easy to fill the mountains with theodolites and surveyors' chains! It suited him for the moment to make a promise, and a promise was accordingly made."*

Three problems awaited Mr. Mackenzie on entering office, the discontent of British Columbia on the inevitable violation of the compact under which she entered the Union; the New Brunswick school imbroglio, and the amnesty to Louis Riel, the murderer of Scott. On the 20th of July, 1871, as we have seen, British Columbia entered the Union. She had been induced to do so upon the express understanding that a railroad stretching across the breast of the continent and connecting the newly-acquired province with the East would be completed within ten years. Our Canadian statesmen knew little of the difficulties of great railway construction then, and Sir John gave evidence of this, when laying his finger casually upon the map, he said, "Let that be the terminus of the Pacific Railway." Even, it appears, eminent engineers themselves, with whom ministers consulted, were not aware how stupendous the undertaking was. But though the gigantic character of the enterprise was manifest to Sir John and his colleagues when they were entering the compact, it would be a mistake to suppose that they were likely on such an account to stay the act of commitment. They desired the acquisition of British Columbia and knew that once in office, whether they fulfilled their pledge promptly or not, or even not at all, she must remain in her political wedlock. Some of them, however, were induced to seek the construction of the road actuated by a national enthusiasm, highly inflated. But there was some difference between that jingoism which set itself to building up scientific frontiers and plunging suffering mechanics into revolt; and in the overhaste of Canadian statesmen, to undertake, though at inestimable cost a work which they believed would confer commercial greatness upon their country and knit the sundered members into an abiding brotherhood. As for the speeches that were made about the possible military advantages of the road, those who write history are not supposed to take any more account of them than of the ignominious out-going of the training-ship Charybdis.* Let us trust that in future, dis-

* This vessel was brought to Canada with a great flourish of trumpets, and ministers and their supporters pointed out with enthusiasm in the House of Commons, the generosity of the Imperial Government in making the donation. One honorable gentleman, the member for Yamaska, said: "This gift that the country accepts with the greatest gratitude is destined to supply a want long felt in the organization of the forces of the country. * * * Nevertheless we are wanting in marines. This training-ship is calculated to create this new calling, and our young men will be able to defend the country on the high seas with as much skill and valor as on the land." But when the people saw the unsightly old hulk making her way into the harbour of St. John they set up a laugh, nor did the mockery or the banter cease till the government which had made such an ado about her coming were obliged to send the soggy old concern back again. In 1883 Mr. Blake poked a good deal of fun at the ministry and at inflationists of the type of the Yamaska member. Referring to all that the wonderful ship was to do for us, he

Three years having elapsed and the first sod of the road being yet unturned, British Columbia, trembling for the fate of the compact, began to importune the government. According to terms, work should have been commenced within two years, but that date had elapsed by nearly a year. Some declared that British Columbia acted with "indecent haste" in pressing on progress in the work before means for the fulfilment of the same were obtained, before methods of operation were known, and before the route itself had been determined. But with these things the people in the distant province had nothing whatever to do. The Dominion Government solemnly undertook to perform a part: it was the affair then of that Government to achieve it. The people were clamorous and unappeasable. Hundreds of shop-keepers, trades-people and others, had been looking forward to the influx of construction money, and had turned their attention away from other affairs. Many of them, indeed, had made direct and heavy outlays in preparation for the anticipated increase in trade. To make matters worse, just about this time Mr. Mackenzie went to Sarnia and there made a long, and, as we conceive, a foolishly frank speech concerning the Pacific Railway. He condemned, and very justly condemned, the act of his predecessors in tying the country up to the completion of so stupendous an enterprise in a period so short, but declared that while the government would honorably carry out every portion of the compact that was practicable, it would not bind itself to finish the work in ten years, or in any specified number of years. Listening through a long season for the click of the pick-axe, and failing to hear it, it was no wonder that the British Columbians took the alarm when they received these tidings from the lips of the premier. The complaints from the people were so loud, and the solicitations of asked in answering the speech in reply to the address: "But where is she now? Why, sir, you cannot find her even in the speech from the Throne. If no one else will, let me be permitted to pay my respects to the departed Charybdis." The whole affair of this old war-ship was very ridiculous from beginning to end; the action of setting her up as a training-ship was only worthy of a lot of school boys.

the provincial ministry so persistent, that Mr. Mackenzie at last resolved to send a plenipotentiary, in the person of Mr. James D. Edgar, to propose terms for a new arrangement between the respective governments, and to ascertain the general condition of the people of the then little-known colony.

On the 9th of March, 1874, the Dominion agent reached British Columbia. He was promptly called upon by Mr. Walkem, the Premier, to whom he made known his mission and exhibited his credentials. The Colonial Premier did not seem to have any hesitation at this point in accepting Mr. Edgar as the properly accredited agent, and, regarding him in the latter light, introduced him to his colleagues. Mr. Edgar was not long in the country before he found that a considerable number of the persons who made the most grievous outcry were those who had no roots in the soil; that swarms of adventurers and speculators, counting upon the extraordinary circulation of money, had come in and, so to speak, pitched their tents in order to gather while the harvest was going on. Land-grabbers had gone along the proposed line of road, and for small amounts purchased extensive tracts of land, which they believed would bring enormous gains when the trains ran through them.

Mr. Edgar had gone across armed with authority to propose a definite scheme for building the road, but his foot was no sooner in the province than he found the determination upon every face to have what was guaranteed by the Union or nothing at all. The legislation had another year to run, and a week before his arrival it passed this resolution: "That in view of the importance of the Railway Clause of the terms of Union between Canada and British Columbia being faithfully carried out by Canada, this House is of opinion that no alteration in the said clause should be permitted by the Government of this Province until the same has been submitted to the people for endorsement." This resolution was in itself a bar to progress in the negotiations which Mr. Edgar came to press. The agent met the Provincial Cabinet several times, and the difficulty was discussed in all its bearings. Mr. Edgar pointed out that the obstacles to construction were titanic; that engineers had only the most imperfect idea of the difficulties, but that with such knowledge as they possessed they declared that the time remaining was utterly inadequate, with the expenditure of anything like rational annual sums, for the completion of the work. The Canadian Government was prepared, he informed them, to bind itself to a scheme which would guarantee a railway at once from Esquimault to Nanaimo, which road would be vigorously pushed and finished as expeditiously as possible; to make surveys on the mainland and begin them immediately; and he pointed out that to this end a generous grant had been made, and that a large staff of engineers was already under orders. He further showed that while it was impossible for Government to begin the construction of the railroad proper before surveys had been finished and the line laid out, that a post-road would at once be opened up, and telegraph lines be carried across the continent. The ministry further bound itself to expend the minimum sum of a million and a half dollars each year in the Province, after the surveys had been completed, till the termination of the work. Shortly after the above conditions were submitted to the Provincial Government, on behalf of the Canadian Ministry, Mr. Edgar received a letter from Mr. Walkem, setting forth that the Provincial Government did not recognize in him an Agent-general of the Dominion, but merely a person invested with powers to discuss the question under dispute; and he demanded the official authority that conferred any higher function before entering into negotiations of so grave a character. Mr. Edgar sent a dispatch to the Government representing the turn affairs had taken, and asking for a confirmation of authority; but for eight days Mr. Mackenzie kept silent, after which Lieutenant-Governor Trutch received the following dispatch: "I refer ministry to my letter by Mr. Edgar, which sufficiently indicated his mission, and which they recognized. He is now recalled, and I await his return and report." This was exactly in Mr. Mackenzie's manner. It is not certain that Mr. Walkem would have agreed to the proposal; but it is quite certain that the undiplomatic and possibly evasive Premier did not give him an opportunity of doing so. The anxiety of the Local Government was natural enough; they were asked to release the Canadian Government from a contract that was the core of the conditions of Union; and they wished to know if this gentleman with whom they had been holding converse was a mere reporter or go-between for the Government, or a person acting by a code of instructions, whose doings would be binding upon those who sent him. At any rate, it was not excellent statesmanship to waste so much time over a lot of useless negotiation, and when the only part of the whole proceeding that was of any consequence was reached, to suddenly get huffed and break off the negotiations.

The Province was now left to make some move for itself. Accordingly it was decided to send Mr. Walkem to England to argue the case before the Secretary of State for the Colonies. His Lordship (the Earl of Carnarvon) was loth to interfere officially in what he regarded as a domestic dispute, but consented to act as arbitrator between both parties. This proposition was readily and cheerfully accepted, and the Canadian Government made the following proposals:

(1.) To commence at once, and finish as soon as possible, a railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo.

(2.) To spare no expense in settling as speedily as possible the line to be taken by the railway on the mainland.

(3.) To make at once a waggon road and line of telegraph along the whole length of the railway in British Columbia, and to continue the telegraph across the continent.

(4.) The moment the surveys and roads on the mainland are completed, to spend a minimum amount of $1,500,000 annually upon the construction of the railway within the Province.

Taking up each point seriatim the British Columbians replied: (1.) That nothing is being done by the Dominion Government towards commencing and pushing on a railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo.

(2.) That the surveying parties in the mainland are numerically very weak; and that there is no expectation in British Columbia, or guarantee given on the part of the Dominion, that the surveys will be proceeded with speedily.

(3.) That the people of British Columbia do not desire the waggon road offered by the Dominion Government, as it would be useless to them; and that even the telegraph proposed to be constructed along the line of the railway cannot be made until the route to be taken by the railway is settled.

(4.) That "the moment the surveys are completed," is not only an altogether uncertain but, at the present rate of proceeding, a very remote period of time, and that an expenditure of $1,500,000 a year on the railway within the Province will not carry the line to the boundary of British Columbia before a very distant date.

The Earl recommended :

"(1.) That the section of the railway from Esquimaux to Nanaimo should be begun at once.

"(2.) That the Dominion Government should greatly increase the strength of the surveying parties on the mainland, and that they should undertake to expend on the surveys, if necessary, for the speedy completion of the work, if not an equal share to that which they would expend on the railway itself, if it were in actual course of construction, at all events some definite minimum amount.

"(3.) Inasmuch as the proposed waggon road does not seem to be desired by British Columbia, the Canadian Government and Parliament may be fairly relieved of the expense and labour involved in their offer; and desirable, as in my opinion, the construction of the telegraph across the continent will be, it perhaps is a question whether it may not be postponed till the line to be taken by the railway is definitely settled.

"(4.) The offer made by the Dominion Government to spend a minimum amount of $1,500,000 annually on the railway within British Columbia, as soon as the surveys and waggon road are completed, appears to me to be hardly as definite as the large interests involved on both sides seem to require. I think that some short and fixed time should be assigned within which the surveys should be completed; failing which, some compensation should become due to British Columbia for the delay."

After a little diplomatic wrangling, the "Carnarvon terms" were laid before the Dominion Government, which provided (1) that the railway from Esquimaux to Nanaimo, on Vancouver Island, should be begun and finished with all despatch; (2) that the surveys on the mainland should be pushed on with all possible vigour; (3) that the waggon road and telegraph line should be immediately constructed; (4) that $2,000,000 yearly, not $1,500,000, should be the sum expended on construction, and (5) that on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the road should be open for traffic from the Pacific seaboard to a point on the western end of Lake Superior. Thus was the matter settled for the time; but, during the following session, dissatisfaction once more broke out in British Columbia and its people began to threaten secession. It now only remained for the Dominion authorities to devise the methods by which the road was to be constructed—whether by the Government itself or by private capital. It is certain that each member of the Government took the gloomiest view of the situation, and many of its number held the conviction that when the line was constructed it must create a deficit, each year, of two or three millions in travelling expenses. Various acts of legislation were introduced to carry the "Carnarvon terms" into effect; but these were either opposed or miscarried, and it was left to a succeeding ministry to remove the railroad from the arena of Parliamentary debate and set it down on the prairie and the mountain.

The history of the New Brunswick school difficulty has been elsewhere dealt with in these pages, as has also the lurid story of Riel. We cannot, in the space now remaining to us, follow Mr. Mackenzie through every detail of his administration, but must content ourselves with a hasty glance at his most important work. During the year 1876, the United States demanded of Great Britain the extradition of certain fugitives from justice, under the terms of the tenth clause of the Ashburton treaty, but the English Government refused to grant the request, unless upon the condition that the offenders should not be tried for any offence other than that for which their surrender had been demanded. To this reasonable stipulation the United States Government would not agree, and the operation of the clause named was for the time suspended. Canadian criminals fled across the boundary, finding protection under the American flag, and forgers, murderers and escaped convicts came trooping from the republic into our cities, where they laughed at the laws they had outraged. Such a state of affairs, though happily altered now, was, of course, intolerable; but the British Government receded from its position and the suspended clause assumed its former virtue. A joint extradition act has since been agreed to by the Governments of the United States and Canada, and the scandal has now ceased to outrage morality. In 1874 the general election law providing for vote by ballot, simultaneous elections and the abolition of property qualifications for members was passed. In 1875 was established the Supreme Court of Canada, having civil and criminal jurisdiction throughout the Dominion, and taking away—though only in name—the right of appeal to England, except where imperial interests were involved; in the same session were passed the Canada temperance, the homestead exemption, the petition of right, the militia, the maritime court and the public accounts audit acts. By the latter it was provided that the auditor-general should, in a sense, be a detective, his functions being to keep his eyes open for ministerial dishonesty; and his office was put beyond cabinet control. As the assumption of the act was that governments are given to steal, and that auditors are not incorruptible, persons as suspicious as the framers of the measure must be in a state of perpetual alarm, lest dishonest ministers may some day league themselves with the temptable auditor for the purpose of plunder. Besides these important measures, it is to the credit of Mr. Mackenzie that he has left to us, though in leges non scriptae, a wider range of constitutional privilege. The authorities of the colonial office, during the early years of Lord Dufferin's régime, had through the usual plural pronoun of the first estate, issued these instructions to the Governor-General. "If, in any case, you see sufficient cause to dissent from the opinion of the major part, or the whole of our privy council for our Dominion, it shall be competent for you to exercise the powers and authorities vested in you by our commission, and by these our instructions, in opposition to such their opinion." These, of course, are the words of a scribe, and the sentiments of a sovereign, innocent of the trend of modern history, and of the nature of Canadian spirit. Mr. Mackenzie, to his credit be it said, challenged this dictum of Downing-street, that opened correspondence with the colonial office, and contended that the Governor-General, his council and the parliament of Canada, should bear the same relation to the people of the Dominion, with regard to all acts of domestic policy, as the Queen, her privy council, and the imperial parliament bear to Great Britain. To this firm contention, the home office, after some resistance, with a complacent shrug, at last consented. A good deal has been written by light writers and by heavy writers, concerning the functions of a Governor-General, or his lieutenant, under responsible government; and we have long seen "Constitutional heirophants" picking their feeble way through a waste of constitutional tomes by the light of a tallow dip. Some assert that the duty of the Governor-General is now merely to sign documents; while others maintain that he is the agent of the state that appoints him, and holds in his hand a power greater than the people. With the latter view, we may say, we are in accord. To talk of the supremacy of the people in a subordinate state, is to utter a paradox, even though the shadow of foreign domination fell across our country but once in a generation. Practically (though there is at least one important exception) we do now govern ourselves; but we sometimes forget that we do so only by courtesy, though no doubt courtesy is not likely at this late day to be exchanged for anything bearing a harder name. The type of a perfect legislative and governing system is the municipal institution. The warden (or reeve, as he is sometimes called), is not himself the authority, but the executor of the council's will; the receptacle wherein resides the authority of the assemblage. Authority is indivisible, and is resident only in unity; and in the municipal institution is begotten of the council—which is an embodiment of the people's will—and is expressed through the person presiding. The warden has no power save that which he derives from those over whom he presides; but he is at once the executor and the representative of the will of that body. This is, then, the true type of government by the people. In the Canadian cabinet, the authority of ministers is resident in, and administered by, the president of the council; but that authority is paraded before the nominal authority of the foreign power, as vested in the agent of the latter, and may be accepted or set aside. In our Provincial Governments the case is the same in form, though differing greatly in nature, the Canadian ministry filling in a large degree the place of the foreign power with respect to the higher cabinet. Our friends in the republic glory in sounding upon their trumpets that they have government by the people; but in the veto, which is an assumption that one man is wiser than many millions, there is more than the phantom of a king. The Governor-General may be a "wooden horse," but like that of the Greeks before the gates of Troy, he has within him a power though now fallen into desuetude. We have been fortunate in the mild sway of such agents as the Dufferins and the Lornes, and the Lansdownes; but we may get another Metcalf before we are all gray, and then we shall probably have—Independence.

In 1877, it became known to Mr. Mackenzie that the Imperial Government were about appointing, as the Canadian representative at the Halifax fishery commission, an English diplomatist. The Premier at once offered a firm protest, and maintained that it would be impolitic if the Dominion were to be without a local representative in view of the magnitude of her interests at stake. The Imperial Government, however, did not consider that we were entitled to a domestic commissioner, contending, among themselves, that it was an affair of the empire—though the interests of Canada alone were at stake. Yielding, however, to the uncompromising attitude of Mr. Mackenzie and the ministry, and “to satisfy the colonists,” Sir A. T. Galt was nominated. In addition to the higher grounds of manhood, equality and liberty, which make the scheme of Canadian Independence so dear to all those who dislike the idea of continuing to be subjects of a distinct European state when they may be citizens of their own, are several questions bearing upon the trade and welfare of our people, by which we suffer from being held in leading-strings. It is surely more than an imaginary grievance that we are not permitted to make our own commercial treaties, but must be content to accept the agreements entered into on our behalf by the distant and old world government. In a speech of uncommon power, during the session of 1882, Mr. Blake contended that the right of making Canadian treaties should be vested in the Dominion government. Some time afterwards, certain writers in the newspapers declared that Mr. Blake was a staunch friend of Canadian Independence; whereupon, at a public gathering in Montreal a few months later, he repudiated his utterances at the late session of parliament, by declaring that we now, practically, had self-government in Canada. Where Mr. Blake now stands on national questions, we are not any the more clear since his recent utterance on the morrow succeeding the last general election. In that manifesto he certainly does not stand where he stood at Aurora, though, it is true, time has marched on with the country since then. Mr. Blake’s great speeches, unfortunately, but too often resemble railway trains running in different directions, eventually meeting in disastrous collision.

After the defeat of Sir John at the polls, the conservative party were crestfallen, and were many dreary weeks before they had spirit to raise their heads. Two or three members at a caucus, which at last made a desperate effort for life and organization, were of the opinion that Sir John had seen his time and done his work; but such counsel only stirred the deep-seated loyalty of the party to the chief who had led them so often to victory, to a new activity. Once again the well-beloved leader sat at the head of his erstwhile scattered followers, and began to whisper in their ear words of hope. He had been studying the political situation, and saw that decay had laid its hand upon the ruling party. The country had fallen into a state of commercial atrophy, and year after year, during the administration of Mr. Mackenzie, saw the situation grow worse. Enterprise was without heart, capital shrank timidly away, and confidence had fairly gone out of the country. Each session of parliament showed a large deficiency in receipts in comparison with the expenditure. For some time previous to 1874, the customs duties on unenumerated imports had been 15 per cent., but in the session of the last-named year, to meet the threatened deficit, Mr. (now Sir) R. J. Cartwright, minister of finance, introduced a measure providing for an increase to $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Mr. Cartwright, like all other statesmen, had no hesitation in admitting that taxation was bad; but he preferred taxation, pure and simple, to taxation with a saving clause. His increase fell into the gaping jaws of deficit, which still hungered for more. Year after year the balance was on the wrong side of the book, till at last trade was languishing so low that it would have died had that been possible; commercial houses and financial institutions which had been regarded firm as the hills came toppling down; our people were fleeing the country in thousands looking for work, while the solicitations of the idle for employment and of the hungry for bread, were heard in every Canadian city. The government cannot manipulate the State as it manages a department; nevertheless crises do sometimes arise, when a judicious touch of the hand may give a new direction and a life to motionless commercial forces. The people, whether unreasonably or not, believed that it lay within the power of legislation to better their condition, and they waited upon Mr. Cartwright in hundreds, telling their woes and asking his help. But that statesman assured them that in such an emergency as this, and face to face with these problems of trade, government was only a fly on the wheel; and, turning gloomily away, the sufferers heard it whispered abroad that the cure the finance minister had for this deplorable state of things was direct taxation.

"Our opportunity has come," said Sir John, Macdonald to his colleagues, at a caucus held about this time; "want has overcome the prejudice of a theory, and we will propound a policy that will better this woful state of affairs and carry us back to office." From that day forth the conservative chief began to organize and marshal his forces, to "get his hand upon the pulse of the country," and to breathe into his own followers the same hope and ardour that filled himself. Sir Richard Cartwright jeered at the "new-fangled doctrines," and his chief losing a momentary restraint upon his vernacular, affirmed in broad Scotch, "that the scheme was the corn laws again with a new face." The question presented to the ministry was one between commercial misery and a favoured theory, "but, in deference to the formula, they chose to be stiff-necked, and kicked complaining industry into the camp of their opponents."*

In the House of Commons on the 10th of March, 1876, Sir John boldly laid down the broad "national policy" of his party, in a speech of much vigour and point. His contention was that there should be a thorough reorganization of the tariff, which ought to be constructed in such a manner that it would, while producing sufficient revenue for the current expenses of the country, also afford a stimulus and a protection to home industry, entice capital to the country, and keep our own artisans at home at the employment which must arise under the fostering legislation. Once again the cry went abroad, and at this time at the dictation of the conservative chief, "Canada for the Canadians!" The heralds appeared through the country giving the shibboleth a liberal translation, assuring the clamorous workmen it meant that when they came to the Liberal Conservative ministry for bread, they would not be offered a stone in the form of direct taxation; that henceforth our raw material would not be sent out of the country to give employment to the artisans of foreign cities; and that no longer would the American "drummer" be found selling his goods upon the threshold of our crumbling and idle factories. On the 17th of September, 1878, the two parties appeared at the polls, Sir Richard Cartwright and the ministry bound neck and heel to their idol ; Sir John with the light of hope in his eye, and "Canada for the Canadians" upon his lips. The change which he predicted had come. It swept the country in a whirlwind, and the ministry fell, and their god fell with them :

" Like the leaves of the forest when the summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen ;
Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay withered and strown."

CHAPTER XXIII.

SIR JOHN REDIDIVUS.

THE defeat of the Mackenzie administration, though signal and unmistakable, was, it must honestly be said, no discredit to its chief. He and his government had fallen upon evil times, and the times were not bettered by stubborn adherence to an inflexible, though well-meaning policy. Up to almost the end, it was even doubtful whether Mr. Mackenzie and his cabinet realized the true state of public opinion. It is the fashion to call public opinion fickle, but, on that as on many other similar occasions, there was justification for the fickleness, in the desire for a change in the fiscal policy of the country, and this we say without endorsing the policy substituted for it, or deeming it, then or now, in the best and lasting interest of the Dominion. In the meantime a change was sought; only by a change, seemingly, in the administration could the country rally from its night of depression. So off rolled the clouds again which had temporarily obscured the hero of our story and we find him once more at the helm of affairs, potent still for great endeavour and full of resource in leading the van of national enterprise. In coming again to the front, Sir John Macdonald had his usual good luck, a luck which has followed him throughout life, and which, since 1873, the period we have now reached, has been many times exemplified. "The repeated return of Sir John Macdonald to power," said a writer, the other day, when the great Chieftain had closed forever his career, "is little short of miraculous. It has few parallels in history. It is, in reality, as creditable to the people as to the Minister, and this may be said without any reference to the peculiar measures which he carried."

After the verdict of the polls, Mr. Mackenzie did not wait till the assembling of Parliament, but, with the demeanour of an honest man, who had tried to do his duty, he and his cabinet relinquished office. On the 10th of October, 1878 the outgoing ministry tendered Lord Dufferin their resignations, and His Excellency then called in Sir John Macdonald to form an administration. The new cabinet was as follows:—

THE RIGHT HON. SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD	-	-	-	-	Premier and Minister of the Interior.
HON. S. L. TILLEY	-	-	-	-	Min. of Finance.
“ CHARLES TUPPER	-	-	-	-	Min. of Public Works.
“ ALEXANDER CAMPBELL	-	-	-	-	Receiver-General.
“ H. L. LANGEVIN	-	-	-	-	Postmaster-General.
“ J. C. AIKINS	-	-	-	-	Secretary of State.
“ J. H. POPE	-	-	-	-	Min. of Agriculture.
“ JAMES MACDONALD	-	-	-	-	Min. of Justice.
“ MACKENZIE BOWELL	-	-	-	-	Min. of Customs
“ J. C. POPE	-	-	-	-	Min. Marine and Fisheries.
“ L. F. G. BABY	-	-	-	-	Min. Inland Revenue.
“ L. F. R. MASSON	-	-	-	-	Min. Militia and Defence.
“ JOHN O'CONNOR	-	-	-	-	Pres. of Council.
“ R. D. WILMOT	-	-	-	-	Speaker of Senate (without portfolio).

There was now universal rejoicing from end to end of Torydom. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that about one fifth of the adult male Conservatives in the country effected an office of some kind, and that ninety per cent. of the remainder anticipated profit of some pecuniary sort by the change; in addition to this, there was unbounded faith in the promises made on the hustings that the clouds of depression would roll away and the sun of prosperity shine. There was some fear expressed even in Conservative quarters that the new ministers were about to introduce the pernicious American system of rotation of office; for it was well known that almost immediately after the new party came into power several efficient officers were removed on no presumable grounds save that they were loyal to their political convictions, and were not afraid to give voice to them. The smaller the community the more bitter and more deplorable, evidently, is the tussle for party spoils. Each such little community, in a political sense, is in the hands of half a dozen noisy and demagogic politicians, and the member who seven times in the day bows down before Votes finds himself soon in the same hands. To him when he gets into parliament, fierce must be the importunities, galling the threats, of these masters of his fate. A certain member is entrenched in a riding or county, and, an election drawing near, it is decided to rout him. A clique is formed which at once finds a candidate. The first duty of the candidate is to begin to promise. There is nothing within the range of ordinary necessity that he does not pledge himself to obtain for his people; he is nearly always certain to have made up his mind to get a railway for them as their claims are "exceptional," and would long ago have been granted had the man representing them now been "any good," "on the right side," or something of that sort; he never can see any possible bar that could arise to his obtaining a breakwater, a canal, a special telegraph line, or it may be a meteorological station or a military training school. If, as we have said, the community be very small his word is always pledged to turn out every politically obnoxious official. These pledges, given in haste, he soon finds to be plagues lodged in his bosom to prick and sting him. Installed in his seat, he forgets much that he said in the turmoil of the election; but the little clique that holds its meeting in the bar-room, that chews its tobacco or drives fast horses does not forget;—and if he hearken not to their demands he must expect to have his back broken across the wheel and to see another man take his place.

Finding himself at the head of a large, able and loyal following the light of other days seemed to shine in the Premier's eye, and many declared when they saw him walking about the corridor saying a friendly word to this member, and laying his hand upon the shoulder of the other, that the old elasticity had returned to his step. His position certainly was one of which anyone might be proud. It was in public life in the nature of a miracle, a resurrection from the dead. Five years he had laid in the tomb with a load of infamy upon him as deep as the mound of clay that the Indian heaps upon the corpse of the departed chief. Some of his enemies began to draw consolation from his very triumph and shouted from newspaper to newspaper that his following was too large; that when a following is too large it is always in danger of splitting; and that the Premier would be far better off if he had a snug, sound, working majority

"Yes," said Sir John, "that reminds me of the story of the Indian woman; some one said to her 'squaw, you have been taking too much liquor;' and she replied, 'No; little too much is just enough.'" It was about the same with his followers.

A curious question arose on the assembling of the new House concerning the powers of a Speaker after the demise of Parliament. During the preceding summer, it appears, two members of the Civil Service had resigned their offices in order to become candidates for Parliament. Subsequently to the elections it was represented to the ex-Speakers that it was desirable to have the vacancies filled up as speedily as possible, and Mr. Anglin accordingly made the appointments. The new officials had no sooner entered on their duties than Sir John wrote to the Clerk of the House directing him to recognize no appointment that had been made since the dissolution of Parliament. The clerk at once dismissed the appointees; whereupon Mr. Anglin wrote protesting against the interference of the Executive in a matter that came properly within his jurisdiction. The Clerk of Private Bills in the meantime died, and Mr. Anglin, taking no warning from the letter of the Prime-Minister, reorganized the department by making a distribution of offices. Sir John would not stoop to wrangle, but contented himself with his letters of instructions to the Clerk of the House. When the new Parliament assembled, Mr. Anglin thereupon rose in his place in the House and stated his case and his grievance, though he disclaimed any desire to raise the question as a party issue. His opinion was that until the appointment of the present incumbent, he, Mr. Anglin, was the de facto speaker, and entitled to exercise all the functions pertaining to the office. Our own Internal Economy Act specifically conferred upon the Speaker the power of appointing an accountant. Whatever powers he could properly exercise in the interim between the sittings of Parliament, must, he contended, pertain to him after Parliament was dissolved and until the assembling of the new House. He believed, he said, that his interpretation of the law was correct, and he was anxious now to get a candid expression of opinion before the House. Sir John, in reply, agreed that there was no question of politics involved in this matter, that it was one solely of law; and he denied emphatically that there was any disposition on the part of the Crown to encroach on the powers of the Speaker or the privileges of the House of Commons. He took issue, however, with Mr. Anglin in his interpretation of the Internal Economy Act, and the rules and practices of the Canadian Parliament. In Canada there was really no Parliament and no Speaker in the interval between the dissolution and the assembling of the new House, and the act of 1868 only gave the Speaker rights for the special purposes of the Act set out in the Act itself. One of these rights, and the only one, was the appointment of an accountant. It did not follow, and it was absurd to claim, that the power of dismissal involved the power of appointment. Indeed, the very reverse of that proposition was true, namely, that the power to appoint involved the power to dismiss. The honorable gentleman had no power to make the appointments in question, and as a matter of expediency, since he had practically ceased to be responsible for the administration of the affairs of the House, it was not desirable that he should have such power. It was unwise of the honorable gentlemen, and amounted to an attempt at usurpation, to make appointments to office after all essential responsibility on his part had ceased, and it would have been in better taste to have left it to the present Speaker, upon whom the responsibility of administration devolved, to fill up the vacancies. Sir John, however, admitted the provisions of the existing Act to be inadequate, at the same time declaring it as his conviction that when the House came to deal with the subject the amendments would certainly not be in the direction of confirming Mr. Anglin's views.

It certainly seems strange how a person of the ex-Speaker's acknowledged abilities should have calmly, and after proper consideration, adhered to the view which he propounded in the House. We, ourselves, favour the view expressed elsewhere on the subject*: "The Speaker is the president and executive officer of the House, and certain authority is conferred upon him by virtue of his office. But it is only as a member of Parliament that he has these powers; when the body from which his jurisdiction emanates is dissolved, then his functions cease. For him to affirm that his authority remained after the decease of Parliament, a portion of whose machinery he was, seems like the human hand assuming vitality and direction after the rest of the body is dead. Suppose that at the election Mr. Anglin had been defeated, he would, upon his own theory, still have assumed the duties of "First Commoner," while he was only a common individual; but who would make the appointments had he died the day after Parliament was dissolved? There must surely, in such case, be some reserve authority; and whatever that authority is it would come into force on the day of the Speaker's political decease, no less than on the day of his bodily death." Notwithstanding Mr. Anglin's assurance that he did not desire to make the question a party one, a party one it speedily became,—reformers championing the ex-Speaker, conservatives rallying around their Chief.

One of the first acts of the Opposition after it had come to thoroughly realize its downfall was to dethrone Mr. Mackenzie from the leadership and put Mr. Blake in his place. †

*"Canada under the Administration of Lord Lorne," p. 110.

† Nothing succeeds like success; but woe to the man who leads the failing cause. Not alone will thunder and the winds prevail against him, but he must bear the sins of the lightning and the tempest. Sometimes the man brings disaster on the cause, sometimes the cause brings ruin upon itself; it is the victim only that is certain. But yesterday the word of Cæsar stood against the world; to-day he lies there, none so poor as to do him reverence. We have not any Cæsars in Canada,

It was during this Session that a conclusion was reached in the famous "Letellier Case." In 1876, M. Luc Letellier de St. Just, a Senator of the Dominion, and a member of Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. M. Letellier was a muscular and zealous partisan, and it was too much to hope that his appointment would make him a convert to neutrality. He came into the council chamber of his advisers as comes an emissary from the camp of an implacable foe. The leader of the Government was M. De Boucherville, a gentleman of very little force of character, and evidently little tact; but the real direction was given to affairs by M. Angers, who sat in the legislative council. Both of these gentlemen disliked and mistrusted the new governor; they saw in him, thrust into their councils by opponents, among whom he was a leader and a favourite, an arch-enemy. The Governor regarded his advisers as a band of political opponents, conspiring to carry out the ends of their party alone. Neither side, probably, was wrong in its estimate. "From the first, there was a semblance of harmony between M. Letellier and the Cabinet, and a genuine cordiality between himself and some of its members. But after a time the conviction forced itself upon the Governor that his advisers were treating him as a mere figure-head, a something that had a voice but not a head, a 'yes,' but not a 'no.' This was, perhaps, also an extreme view, though it was in a great measure justified by the attitude of the Council.

nor any supremely great causes, but we have cases that sometimes suggest comparison with things conveying higher morals. While Mr. Alexander Mackenzie was in office there were not wanting many to bear testimony to his honesty, his prudence, his clear insight and capacity for administration; but the sun had not gone down after it was known that he had been defeated before the same men came to utter maledictions, and to lay at his door responsibility, for the disaster to their cause. Then the disaffected ones began to plot the overthrow of their leader, and they cast about for a man to take his place. At this time Mr. Edward Blake was not a member of Parliament, but in October, 1879, he was elected for Durham, whereupon several Reform politicians waited upon him, and made known their desire that he should assume the leadership of the party. It is not necessary to record here, if it were worth while, that Mr. Blake either offered opposition or felt exalted by the offer; he had for years shown a well-bred and politic dislike of Mr. Mackenzie, and felt convinced that the leadership belonged to himself. Various

It had been whispered abroad that M. Letellier did not see things as MM. de Boucherville and Angers saw them, but this was declared to be a matter of little moment, as the Governor was a mere Ministerial tool who was not to do what he wished, but what he was told." On the other hand, the Governor believed that his function was one of surveillance rather than of consultation; that his chief duty was to watch his advisers and resist their acts, rather than be guided by their counsels. But he forgot that they were responsible to the people, not to him, for their misdeeds; perhaps he was ignorant of this responsibility but deemed their intentions and their policy dishonest, and such as the Province would not have sanctioned could it see the inward motives of the ministry's policy. However, it was the rupture that from the first was inevitable that soon came. An announcement in the Provincial Gazette, over the name of His Honour, whereas His Honour had, up to the time of publication, never so much as heard of the notification. "If they put my name to this announcement without my cognizance," thought the Governor, "presently they will in like manner commit me to something of graver moment." In addition to this "slight" to His Honour's prerogative, a Bill providing for the levy of new taxes had been proposed to the Legislature without having been submitted to him. On the strength of these acts of disregard for the prerogative and rights of the Crown, and an implied lack of confidence in the prudence, capacity and probity rumours were afloat during the early part of the session, respecting the alleged ill-feeling and rivalry between Messrs. Mackenzie and Blake, and for many weeks it was understood that the former gentleman would not resign the mantle, unless compelled to do so by a vote of the majority of his supporters. The followers of Mr. Blake, it was ascertained, suggested that a caucus of Liberals should be held and the question squarely submitted; but Mr. Mackenzie's admirers saw in this humiliation for their leader, and, it is said, advised resignation. It is by no means certain that, had the recalcitrant Reformers been less obtrusive in demanding the leadership for Mr. Blake, Mr. Mackenzie, somewhat broken in spirit by defeat, and shattered in health by a too close attention to the duties of a double department, would not have thrown off the galling harness. It is certain, however, that the most delicate methods to effect the removal were not adopted, and that the ex-Premier felt the act more bitterly than his defeat at the polls, or any other cross in his public career. On the 27th of April, looking very calm, and of his advisers, M. Letellier dismissed the Cabinet. The note of dismissal is about one of the most curious pieces of statecraft literature enshrined in constitutional history. The following are the concluding words of the note: "For all these causes the Lieutenant-Governor cannot conclude this memorandum without expressing to the Premier the regret he feels at being no longer able to continue to retain him in his position, contrary to the rights and prerogatives of the Crown." Here it will be seen that the peg for hanging the dismissal upon is a violation of "the rights and prerogatives of the Crown," yet His Honour had already with his own hand written an absoivement of the Ministry from that charge in these words: "There was no intention on the part of the Premier to disregard the prerogatives of the Crown." And further: "It was only an error in good faith." Probably affairs were in a bad way in the Province of Quebec at that time—doubtless they were; it is beyond question that the Ministry were resorting to all sorts of questionable means to raise revenue and forward their own interests; it may even be made abundantly plain that M. Letellier had just and sufficient grounds for dismissing his advisers, but most assuredly he fails to set down in his memorandum valid reasons for his action.

The coup d'état plunged the Province into a scene of the wildest confusion. M. Joly, an upright and clear-headed man, was called upon to form an Administration. This accomplished, there was an appeal to the people, which resulted in a bare majority for the newly-chosen leader.

showing no trace of the humiliation that must have been burning within him, he rose from his place, and simply said. "I desire to say a word or two with regard to my personal relations to the House. I yesterday determined to withdraw from the position as leader of the Opposition, and from this time forth I will speak and act for no person but myself." With characteristic generosity, Sir John Macdonald promptly arose and replied: "Of course we, on this side of the House have nothing to say to such a decision; but I can say that I hope the honorable gentleman who takes the place of the honorable member for Lambton and his party, will display the same ability, earnestness and zeal for what he thinks and believes to be for the good of the country, as have been displayed by my honorable friend who has just taken his seat." Two days later, a caucus of Reform members was held, and Mr. Blake was chosen leader. On the 7th of May, Parliament was prorogued by the Marquis of Lorne.—"Canada under the Administration of Lord Lorne."

On the 11th of April, the question came up in the House of Commons, on a motion by Sir John Macdonald, in amendment to the motion for Committee of Supply, "That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that the recent dismissal by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec of his Ministers was, under the circumstances, unwise and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown since the concession of the principle of Responsible Government to the British North American Colonies" Sir John supported this motion in a speech of three hours, in which he dealt with the subject mainly from a constitutional standpoint. Setting out by justifying his proceeding in this way instead of by a substantive resolution, he dwelt upon the importance, at this stage of the country's history, of avoiding the establishment of evil precedents. It was a strange thing that having gained Responsible Government for Canada, almost at the point of the bayonet, we should be called upon at this day to defend its first principles. There was a great difference between prerogative power and constitutional right. An Act which might be sustained by the Courts as the legal prerogative of the Crown might be exercised in the most unconstitutional way. Constitutional usage was now pretty well defined. Setting aside the legal view with regard to the Quebec difficulty, he contended that the Ministry should have governed, and should have been free to govern, so long as they possessed the confidence of the Legislature. If there was any exception to this doctrine, it was when the Crown had reason to believe that the Parliament did not represent the country. Referring particularly to the Quebec matter, he said that the Lieutenant-Governor when appointed found a Government in office sustained by large majorities in both branches of the Legislature. Not a single reason given for their dismissal would hold. He quoted the several cases in England where the Sovereign had exercised the prerogative of dismissal, and said that the only one referred to by the defenders of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec which was worth noticing was that of the Melbourne Government; and Greville, whose account had been confirmed by Baron Stockmar, showed that the failure of Lord Melbourne to sustain the Whig character of his Government afforded William IV. a reason for the dismissal which was not generally understood. The excuse had considerable force, yet by entire concensus of practical statesmen and theoretical writers it has been admitted that the king was wrong. The case which corresponded most closely to that of Quebec was the South African Case, where Sir Bartle Frere dismissed his Ministry. But he acted in the face of a great danger, in which the Local Government declined to use the burgher force for the maintenance of Imperial interests, and Sir Bartle Frere took the course which he did to support those interests which he was appointed peculiarly to maintain. Moreover, his action was defended by the Pall Mall Gazette and the Saturday Review as being justifiable on grounds similar in principle to those which would justify the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—that is to say, the imminence of a rebellion or threatened war. The course of Sir George Bowen, Governor of South Australia, who had insisted upon sustaining his Ministry—in the face of an adverse Upper House, and in the face of circumstances which tended to excite the suspicion that they had in contemplation the disarrangement of the whole machinery of government—simply because they had a majority in the representative chamber and therefore presumably commanded the confidence of the people, had been ably and properly sustained by the Liberal press in England. The British Constitution must be judged of as it is now, and not as it was fifty or seventy-five years ago. He then quoted the following passages from Mr. W. Bagehot's papers in the Fortnightly Review :—

“ Experience shows that the power of dismissing a Government with which Parliament is satisfied, and of dissolving that Parliament upon an appeal to the people, is not a power which a common hereditary monarch will in the long run be able beneficially to exercise. Accordingly this power has almost, if not quite, dropped out of the reality of our Constitution. Nothing, perhaps, would more surprise the English people than if the Queen, by coup d'état and on a sudden, destroyed a Ministry firm in the allegiance and secure of a majority in Parliament. That power indisputably, in theory, belongs to her; but it has passed so far away from the minds of men, that it would terrify them if she used it, like a volcanic eruption from Primrose Hill. * * The Queen can hardly now refuse a defeated Minister the chance of a dissolution any more than she can dissolve in the time of an undefeated one, and without his consent. * *

“And no monarch should dissolve Parliament against the will and the interest of the Ministry which is in power. No doubt the King can dismiss such a Ministry and replace it by another Administration whose advice to dissolve Parliament he could take; but even with this precaution, to act thus towards a Ministry, which had a strong majority in Parliament, would be to strike a blow which it is almost impossible to suppose. We do not believe that Queen Victoria herself, in spite of the popularity and respect with which she is surrounded, to a greater extent perhaps than any of her predecessors, would ever have recourse to such a measure. * * In practice, in England the Sovereign considers himself obliged to follow the advice of the Ministry which the House of Commons desires to maintain in power. All prerogatives at variance with this principle have fallen into disuse, but the Sovereign may accord to the people a majority which is denied it in the House of Commons, but to strike from behind, so to speak, and strangle, by means of an appeal to the country, a Ministry, sustained by Parliament, would be an event which no longer enters into the calculation, although, in former times, instances of this occurred in our annals.”

Freeman on the “Growth of the English Constitution,” the speech of Lord Dufferin at Halifax in the summer of 1873, and the instructions of Lord Grey (Colonial Secretary) to Lord Elgin in 1847, were also quoted in support of the same view. In the Quebec case every objection taken by the Lieutenant-Governor to his late Ministry, except one, had reference, not to their administration, but to their legislation. There was a distinct difference between acts of administration and acts of legislation, and while the Crown was nominally a branch of the legislative power, it had really ceased to be so. Any member of the Quebec Legislature could have introduced of his own motion and without consulting anybody, the measure for the introduction of which the Lieutenant-Governor had dismissed his advisers; if the house chose to carry it, the Ministry would have been obliged to yield; and it would have been a contempt of the privileges of the Legislature for any one to justify resistance to the will of the majority by quoting or suggesting what were the opinions of the representative of the Crown on the subject. He had been a member of the Administration under five Governors-General, and he ventured to assert that the Ministry never submitted a bill to the representative of the Sovereign, and only had his general assent at the commencement of a session to its financial measures. Only recently the Stamp Act of the Minister of Inland Revenue had been so changed that its introducer could not recognize his production when the House got through with it. It could not be said that the Governor-General had any responsibility for that bill, either in its inception or after it had been virtually destroyed. According to Bagehot, "the Sovereign has, under a constitutional monarchy such as ours, three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn; and a king of great sense and sagacity would want no others." "The Queen," says the same authority, "has no veto. She must sign her own death warrant if the Houses unanimously send it up to her." The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec allowed legislation to proceed without a suggestion or warning, and at the last hours of the session unceremoniously dismissed his Ministers. His conduct was a coup d'état. It was unwise and an outrage upon the Constitution. It could hardly be doubted, at all events it was broadly alleged, that the course of the Lieutenant-Governor was dictated by his desire to seize upon power for his friends in view of a general election for the Dominion. No man fully aware of his responsibilities would have taken such a step. It remained to be seen whether the Premier, upon whom the mantle of Baldwin had fallen, would turn his back upon the principles he had so long professed, and which had been the chief credit and the chief honour of his party.

The Reformers promptly came to the Lieutenant-Governor's assistance. By way of defending Provincial autonomy, Mr. Mackenzie declared that the proposed interference was exceedingly unwise, and subversive of the first principles of responsible government. The motion was lost in the House of Commons, but it carried in the Senate.

The next session saw Sir John in power, and the question still kept the country on fire. The French Conservatives, to whom M. Letellier was particularly obnoxious, began to fear that Sir John would not in office consummate the act for which he had striven when in Opposition. Consequently, at an early day after the opening of Parliament, M. Mousseau, a prominent French Conservative, moved a resolution, adopting in it precisely the same words as those employed by Sir John in the previous session. This was a stroke of diplomacy worthy of the Prime Minister himself, and left no course open to the members but to grapple with the question. By a vote of 136 to 51 the resolution was carried. The Lieutenant-Governor, having now been condemned by the highest tribunal in the land, expectation sat open-mouthed waiting for the dismissal. But many a day passed, and yet the dismissal did not come. On the 3rd of April however, Sir John rose in his place and made the following statement:—"That a few days after the passing of Mr. Mousseau's resolution he waited on His Excellency the Governor-General, representing to him that after the resolution of the Senate in the last session of Parliament, and the resolution of the House of Commons just referred to, it was the opinion of His Excellency's advisers that the usefulness of M. Letellier as Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was gone, and they advised that in the public interest it was expedient that he should be removed from office. His Excellency was thereupon pleased to state that as the Federal system, introduced by the British North America Act of 1867, was until then unknown in Great Britain or her Colonies, there were no precedents to guide us, that the decision in the present case would settle for the future the relations between the Dominion and the Provincial Governments, so far as the office of Lieutenant-Governor is concerned, and that His Excellency therefore deemed it expedient to submit the advice tendered to him and the whole case with all the attendant circumstances to Her Majesty's Government for their consideration and instructions."

Some of the more excitable and unreasonable of the French Canadian members lashed themselves into a rage over this announcement, and M. Ouimet characterized the course of Lord Lorne in refusing to dismiss upon the advice of his Ministers as "unconstitutional and an infringement of the principles of Constitutional Government given to this country." In reply Sir John said that he "could not agree with the statement that the Constitution had been infringed by the Governor-

General. He would have been pleased if His Excellency had at once accepted the advice tendered him, for the Government were unanimously of the opinion on which it was based; but the advice had not been rejected. The representative of the Queen had simply said that he would like to submit the matter to the Sovereign. There was nothing unconstitutional in such a proceeding, for Canada was as safe in the hands of Her Majesty as in the hands of her representative, and we might be well assured that the liberty and practice of self-government granted to us years ago would not be interfered with. Her Majesty's officers in England were thoroughly conversant with our rights and privileges, and might be relied upon to give advice in consonance therewith, and consistently with our position as a self-governing people.'

It is now pretty well understood that the Governor-General's sympathies were with M. Letellier, and that he believed the Lieutenant-Governor had not travelled beyond the bounds of his jurisdiction. He was, however, well aware that naught that he could do or wish might avail his doomed Lieutenant, since the ruling party cried out for his blood; but he seemed desirous of letting the deed of taking off fall into other hands. The Home Office did not take long to consider the matter, but handed the question back to the Governor-General with this significant declaration: "Her Majesty's Government do not find anything in the circumstances which would justify him (the Governor-General) in departing, in this instance, from the general rule, and declining to follow the decided and sustained opinion of his Ministers, who are responsible for the peace and good government of the Dominion to the Parliament to which, according to the 59th section of the statute, the cause assigned for the removal of a Lieutenant-Governor must be communicated." It was suggested, however, now that much of the passion that had arisen on the question had cooled down, it would be well to give careful consideration to the whole matter and ascertain if the offending of the Lieutenant-Governor merited so serious a punishment as dismissal. But there had been no heat in the Cabinet where the dismissal had been advised, in the first instance, in investigating the question. Therefore, no second judgment was passed, and the Prime Minister pointed out to His Excellency that he and his colleagues still advised dismissal, an now awaited his pleasure. Nothing remained for Lord Lorne but to write his signature, and poor Letellier's head rolled upon the block. We would repeat here what has elsewhere appeared, that M. Letellier's punishment was less a legitimate sequence than an accident; and the fact remains that he is an instance now, as Lord Metcalf was in his day, which proves that the Governor, in whatever sphere, is not a cipher. Had Mr. Mackenzie remained in power, a lesser reason for the dismissal of the ministers than that put forward would have justified the Governor and given a precedent to our Constitution. As it was, M. Letellier's mistake was a sad one. He thought he was in the fullest sense what they had labelled him, a lieutenant-governor; but he found he was only in reality the lieutenant-bugle upon which ministers may sound their will.

It only remains to say that in justifying or condemning the dismissal, all men had to face this question: "Was it constitutional or wise to dismiss a Ministry having the confidence of the House of Assembly?" The majority said that it was not. The minority affirmed that it was constitutional and that it was wise, nay more, that it was expedient to dismiss them because they were corrupt; they pointed to the fact that in the appeal to the people the decision of the Lieutenant-Governor was sustained. It remains but to be added that the blow of dismissal broke M. Letellier's spirit, for he died in the following year.

On the 24th of May, the anniversary of Queen Victoria's birth, a military review was held in Montreal and on the occasion the Governor-General conferred the dignity of knighthood of the order of St. Michael and St. George on Mr. Leonard Tilley, minister of finance, Dr. Tupper, minister of railways and canals, Senator Alexander Campbell, postmaster-general, Mr. Richard Cartwright, M.P., ex-minister of finance, and Mr. W.

P. Howland, Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario. I should also be chronicled that on the 26th of July Sir John A. Macdonald sailed for England, and that on the 14th of the following month he was sworn in at Osborne House, Isle of Wight, as a member of Her Majesty's Imperial Privy Council. After the ceremony, he was introduced to the Queen and the leading members of the Cabinet who were in attendance, by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Secretary of State for the Colonies; and subsequently dined with Her Majesty. Sir John Macdonald is the first and, we believe, the only colonial statesman upon whom such a distinction has been conferred.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE NATIONAL POLICY.

TO look back on the initiation of the National Policy, after we have had twelve years' experience of it, will manifestly make no draft upon our prophetic powers. What we have to say on this once vexed and variedly estimated topic has the advantage of being written, not when the policy was launched, but when we have seen, or nearly seen, its close. While we say this, we are not indifferent to the good it has accomplished. The fair-minded chronicler will admit that, within certain limits, it has been beneficial to the country and given a desirable impetus to native trade. This may be affirmed without doing violence to the conviction that a country cannot be made rich by taxation, or that a heavy increase in the tariff, in the interest of a few, can be advantageous to the interest of the many. Neither need it traverse the belief that Restriction is not better than Free Trade, or that a policy is unsound that excludes Canada from the markets and other commercial advantages of her own Continent. In all the controversy on this subject there has been too great a disposition to prefer the interests of the manufacturer to those of the people. This, if we mistake not, the electorate are now beginning to see, and, unless some measure of Reciprocity can be secured with our neighbours and free trade with the world, a change is likely to be forthcoming. If our country is large, our numbers are small, and in certain industries overproduction is soon reached. But what has most told in bringing about a change of public opinion with regard to the "N.P." is this, that Protection is not only inordinate but insatiable in its demands, and that while the few may have grown rich under it the many have become poor. Nor do the people forget that when the National Policy was formulated it was not so much Protection as Equalization and Re-adjustment that was sought in the tariff. The violation of the pledge, then given, that the raising of the duties was but to balance expenditure with revenue, has only increased the indictment against the N. P., while it has been most cruel to the manufacturers themselves, whom it set out to serve, by inducing them to increase their investments as the tariff was periodically advanced in their interest. No one quarrelled, or would quarrel, with adjusting the tariff so as to give reasonable aid to the native industries that were legitimate and not forced or exotic; but the case is different when taxation has mounted to a rate that bears hard upon the people, and when industries are called into existence and artificially sustained that have no claim to being. In the launching, however, of the National Policy, or as it came to be known,—perhaps less for brevity's sake than for the opportunity it gave the Opposition of making a cockshy of it, as the "N. P."—the new Administration sought and obtained for it political support. Not only was it of use to them as a popular cry, but it enabled them, to increase the revenue, and to rally to their support an influential class with a stake in the community. In so far, it was a politic move; besides this, the times, as we have seen, were hard, and money was wanted to meet Dominion indebtedness in England, and prospectively, to give effect to some plan by which the trans-continental railway might be built. Already, on the new ministers assuming office, Dominion liabilities to the extent of $15,000,000, were about maturing in London; and to meet them, Mr. Tilley, the Finance Minister, was despatched to England, where he succeeded in raising a loan of £3,000,000. The negotiation of the loan, for the time, tided over a crisis: it was, however, not all smooth sailing with the Ministry. The Reform Press now began to taunt the Administration with having gained office through promises which they did not intend to fulfil. Day after day, they derisively besought Mr. Tilley to flick his wand and call down upon the people better times. Depression was everywhere and commerce was in a woful plight. Each morning's paper brought tidings of a new bankruptcy or of the exodus of a hundred workmen to the factories of the New England States. Meanwhile, as we shall see, the new Ministry was quietly but steadily pursuing its course. Gathering about him a number of able experts, and gleaning the opinions of intelligent representatives of the leading Canadian industries, Mr. Tilley set to work to construct a new fiscal policy, differing radically from the old. The object of all preceding tariffs in Canada had been to raise revenue; the new expedient, as we have shown, had for its object, besides the needs of the revenue, the encouragement of native industry. Some supporters and even some members of the Government were so carried away by the prospects of the new departure, and the boon it would be to the manufacturer, that they refused to give pledges that a sufficiency of revenue was to be the measure of the aid given to Protection.

“On the 14th of March, Mr. Tilley submitted his financial statement and his tariff resolutions to the House of Commons. In the opening portion of his speech, he compared the position of the finances and of the commerce of the country with the position when he made his statement in 1873. Then, he contended, there was a steady and increasing revenue, a steady and increasing surplus, and a steady decrease in taxation, in consequence of which he was able with confidence to estimate the expenditure for the succeeding ten years, and to point to the probability of the Pacific Railway being constructed and in running order for a total money grant of $30,000,000 and a land subsidy of 50,000,000 acres. Then, too, the country was prosperous; the banks increasing their capital and paying large dividends; various manufacturing industries throughout the country in operation, giving employment to many thousands of men and remunerative investment for capital; the farmers were contented and making money; the tea and West Indian trades growing and flourishing; and everything in that condition which gave hope and satisfaction to all classes of the people.

But a change of Government had taken place, and a change of policy, and ruin and disaster had overtaken every industry and every branch of trade in Canada. It was to remedy the deplorable condition of affairs which had prevailed for the past four years that the National Policy, suggested by the Conservative Opposition in Parliament and resisted by the Liberal Government, had been so unanimously demanded by the people; and he expressed the hope and belief that the propositions he was about to make would fairly justify the anticipations of the electors. Arriving from England, he had set himself to the work of framing the new tariff. Referring to the past and prospective state of the finances, he said the estimate of expenditure for the year 1878-79 made by his predecessor (Mr. Cartwright), and provided for by the House of Commons in the session of 1878, was in round numbers $23 600,000—slightly less than the estimated income. The actual expenditure amounted, as a matter of fact, to $24,000,000, or a discrepancy of about half a million. The revenue during the past three or four weeks had, in consequence of the excitement in regard to the anticipated tariff changes, been very large; but such increase of revenue ought to be credited to next year's receipts, and if allowance were made for that purpose from the income of this year, the deficit would be increased to $2,400,000; or crediting the abnormal revenue to this year's account, there still would be a deficit of $1,600,000. In order to be able to meet the expenditure requisite for 1879-80, the Government would have to get authority from Parliament to receive an increased revenue from customs of $2,000,000; and, in arranging for the levying of the additional duties, he would ask the House to consider how it might be imposed so as to give protection to our home industries. The volume of imports into Canada had not been materially reduced by the commercial depression, which he regretted. Indeed, he regarded the large balance of trade against us ever since Confederation as one of the main causes of our difficulties. He knew that there were those in the House—especially hon. gentlemen of the Opposition—who held views different from his upon this question; but regarding the enormous excess of imports as an evil, he proposed in the policy he was about to submit to the House to correct it. Much disturbance and mischief had been caused to our trade by the manufacturers of the United States making a slaughter market of Canada. Our tariff since 1873 had favoured their efforts in this direction, while their protective duties had shut our farmers and manufacturers out of their markets. It was the opinion of some that the condition of a country could not be improved or its prosperity increased by legislation. From this view the Government dissented. He would have been glad had he been relieved from the necessity of imposing additional taxation, but having to impose it, the tariff had been so framed that he had the utmost confidence in stating that the larger proportion of the extra two millions for which he required to provide would be levied upon the products of foreign countries, and would not be drawn from the great country—England—of which we form a part. With regard to the United States, the Government intended to impose duties on a great many articles imported from there which had been left on the free list since 1865, in the vain hope of inducing our neighbours to renew the Reciprocity Treaty which they had then abrogated. The Government believed in reciprocity, but not in a one-sided tariff. They regarded it as important to encourage the exportation of our own manufactures to foreign countries, and the extension of our markets generally. In explaining the leading items of the preceding tariff, the Finance Minister stated that the policy of the Government was to select for a higher rate of duty those articles which are manufactured, or can be manufactured, in the country, and to leave those that are neither made nor are likely to be made in the country at a lower rate."

The Reformers fell upon Mr. Tilley as if he were a mad dog. The new policy was loaded with objurgation and ridicule. Mr. Mackenzie, Sir Richard Cartwright, and other leading Liberals declared the new policy to be a return to the barbarous and unwise traditions of the past. Mr. Cartwright made an exhaustive and clever review of the financial situation in his bitterest manner. As for the tariff, he declared that it would neither stimulate home industry nor raise a revenue; but would cripple commercial enterprise without swelling the coffers. When the Oracles at Delphi prophesied they usually did so in enigmas, capable of two interpretations, so that whether the battle was lost or won their explanation as seers was never doubted. But Mr. Cartwright, in bitter and uncompromising English set upon inexorable record the prediction that in both ways this new policy would fail. A sufficient trial proved that in the begetting of revenue it did not fail; and that if it has not signally stimulated native enterprise it certainly has not crippled it. Indeed, it has not only raised revenue, but produced a surplus, and has been coincident with, if it has not in some measure occasioned, the appearance of an era of prosperity hitherto unequalled in Canada. We know that the weevil or the drought is stronger than ministries, and that statutes are powerless to make the corn to spring or the sun to shine; but we do not hesitate to record our conviction that Sir John Macdonald's ministry came upon the scene at an important era, that its cry upon the hustings, before it put a line upon the statute book, roused the spirits of the country, brought public confidence to its feet, and drew capital out of its hiding-place. By its legislation it has done, and it is but fair to admit it, an appreciable amount of good; it has brought into the country's lap millions of dollars of foreign capital, and added immensely to the sum of the national wealth. There are portions of the Dominion, it is true, notably in the North-West, where the people derive little or no benefit from, and perhaps are harshly burdened by, the direct operation of the policy; but they are in a substantial measure repaid for this by the fuller throb in their veins of the general prosperity which it has given to the country. For the time, we say at least, the "N. P." has been of service to Canada. Now, as we have hinted, however, there are indications that the time has come when a change of fiscal policy is desirable, and an extension made in the area of unrestricted trade.

During the month that witnessed the reappearance of Sir John upon the ministerial scene, Lord Dufferin took his departure from Canada; and on November following a new Governor-General, Lord Lorne, accompanied by his consort the Princess Louise, arrived at Halifax.

“There was no lingering of politicians at the capital after adjournment, each hied him to his constituency, where, with the skill of Ariel, he set himself to raise a storm. The tempest, if fierce, was short, and the ministry came out of it neither demolished nor shattered. Mr. Blake had put on his heavy armour and visited Toronto, London, and Hamilton, speaking against the contract in those magnificent sentences of his that are always so distinctly uttered, so strong, so clear and so cold; but Sir Charles Tupper followed him round, delivering address for address, and though his speeches contained much that was only declamation, and not a little that was absurd, or mere unsupported assertion, he told the best story, because his subject had the best side; and beyond inflaming, and in some instances intoxicating, a few score of excitable and not very astute Reformers, there was little gained by the Opposition during the recess.”

On returning to their seats, there was an ominous silence that betokened the early bursting of a storm. Within a day or so certain vague rumors floated through the lobbies concerning a “strong Opposition card.” The chief rumour was that as the Pacific Railroad had once broken Sir John’s back, it would even do so the second time; that a combination of capitalists unexampled in this country for their resources, their experience and their standing, had been formed, who were prepared to construct the road at a figure far less than that named by the Syndicate, and they would ask none of those restrictions which would keep enterprise and settlement so long in shackles in the North-West. This company would come forward, the rumour said, and make its offer, when one of two courses was open to the Government. They must, this confident and awing whisper said, ‘either reject the offer or accept it.’ They dare not reject it, for even their own timid following would not lend themselves to the support of such an iniquity : if they accept it, then, since the scheme belongs purely to the Opposition, there should be no decent course open to the Ministry but to resign. All this took place while Sir John was, apparently, the least exercised of any in the House. "He assured his followers that it was only natural to expect a 'card' of some kind, but that they would be hardly warranted in looking for a very 'strong' one." Presently the scheme was revealed in detail. The new Syndicate offered to build the road in consideration of a money subsidy of $22,000,000 and a land subsidy of 22,000,000 acres ; and they asked for no exemption from duty on articles imported for construction from municipal or Dominion taxation, or for any special privileges or monopolies with regard to the construction of branch lines. With regard to the duty of the Government in dealing with this offer we can only reiterate what has been said elsewhere. "For the Ministry to have entertained the new proposition would not have been either wise or just. It would not have been wise, because the new company had no means of obtaining an estimate of costs, and were obliged to make their offer at random ; it would not have been just, because the government had given ample time for capitalists to make combinations and present their offers ; because they had received and carefully considered several propositions ; and after a sufficiency of time to allow the coming in of all possible tenders had elapsed, they closed with a combination of men whose financial standing and personal character were the highest, and whose proposition in all respects promised more advantage to the country than any other that had been made to them."

On Monday, the 17th of January, Sir Charles Tupper presented the offer of the new syndicate to the House. There was an air half of jubilation and half of curious wonderment upon the faces of many Opposition members ; and one could fancy the whole number finding voice and saying : "Well, Sir John, you are pretty cunning, and have got out of many close places in your life, but you are now in about as tight a box as you have ever been in ; we are a little curious just to see you get out of it." But to the surprise and discomfiture of these gentlemen, instead of being alarmed by the proposal of the "second Syndicate," Sir John, who took the floor, regarded the proceeding as a piece of impudence, and characterized the proposal as a bogus tender. "This whole scheme," he said, "which was ostensibly to assume the responsibility of building and running the line from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, is simply an impudent offer to build the prairie section, and to do it by means of political friends who, when they get in power, will grant them all they want and allow them to confine their exertions, their responsibilities, all the liabilities for the future to building an easy road across the prairies, and so connecting with the American system of railways, and carrying away the trade of the North-West by one or more American channels, to the utter ruin of the great policy under which the Dominion of Canada has been created, to the blighting of our hopes of being a great nation, and to the ruin of our prospect of getting possession of the Pacific trade, and connecting Asia with England by a railway passing through the dominions of England. It is as easy "as rolling off a log" to run a railway across the prairies and work it, but this is an endeavour to deprive this country, to deprive Ontario, to deprive Quebec, to deprive the Maritime Provinces of all connection by railway with the North-West." Comparing the rival projects, he said:—"I appeal to the members of this House as men who are patriots, as men who have the destinies of their country in their hands, not to be hoodwinked, not to be led away by a disingenuous and discreditable trick. I know we can appeal to the patriotism of the people of Canada. We can tell them that we want a line that will connect Halifax with the Pacific Ocean. We can tell them, even from the mouth of our enemies, that out of our lands we can pay off every single farthing taken out of the pockets of the people, twenty-fold, and we will have a great Pacific Railway. This is what we will have. Let me draw a contrast! You are asked to have a railway running from the United States and to the United States. You are asked to have a line by which the trade from the East will run into the States, and by which the legitimate profits of the Lake Superior road will be destroyed. You are asked to have a line by which the trade from the West will run into the States. Mr. Speaker, the whole thing is an attempt to destroy the Pacific Railway. I can trust to the intelligence of this House, and the patriotism of this country, I can trust not only to the patriotism but to the common sense of the nation to carry out an arrangement which will give us all we want, which will satisfy the loyal legitimate aspirations, give us a great, an united, a rich, an improving, a developing, Canada, instead of making us tributary to American laws, to American railroads, to American bondage, to American tolls, to American freights, to all the little tricks and big tricks that American railways are addicted to for the purpose of destroying our road. Look on this picture and then on that, and I know which choice will be made by the people of Canada. And, Sir, I believe before the general elections in 1883, the honorable gentlemen opposite will try to make the people forget, will try to make the people disremember, to use a Western phrase, this publican plot, and will eat their own words before the people as they are trying to do now with regard to the National Policy—and in doing so they will lose the respect of the people of Canada.”

Mr. Blake followed the Premier and characterized the second syndicate as “the strongest combination ever witnessed of Canadian capitalists.” The discussion was for the greater part furious, and there was not a little of personal bitterness exhibited by some of the gladiators. But the fears and the wrath of the Opposition were without avail. Even the thunder of Mr. Blake’s undeniable eloquence deterred no man, and hushed itself, harmlessly, in the leaves of Hansard. The offer of the second syndicate was rejected, and that of the first accepted by a vote of 136 to 51. Although the biographer finds it his duty to set down the consummation of this great work to the credit of Sir John Macdonald, yet it would be less than justice to ignore the force, the ability, the tirelessness and the zeal displayed by Sir Charles Tupper, minister of railways and canals, upon whose shoulders fell the heavy stress of the battle.

It is to be added to this imperfect chronicle of the incidents connected with this great national undertaking, that in the session of 1884 Parliament sanctioned a further subvention to the Pacific Railway of thirty millions of dollars. Since that date, it has still further come to the company's assistance, and showed its generous appreciation of the great work done by the syndicate in the interest alike of Canada and the Empire.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

WE now come to the chief triumph in the career of Sir John Macdonald, the negotiation with a syndicate of capitalists, which resulted in the construction, within an astonishingly brief period, of the great iron highway across the wide, Imperial domain of Canada to the Pacific. That this huge national undertaking is to-day not only an accomplished fact, but, as an engineering feat, one of the marvels of our time, is due in large measure to the practical skill and shrewd administrative ability, coupled with the tireless energy and fervent patriotism, of Sir John Macdonald. In saying this we do not wish to take a leaf from the laurel crowns of Sir George Stephen and Sir Donald Smith, the chief promoters of the enterprise, or to detract from the well-won honours of those who were associated with them in the great achievement of the Company. To those gentlemen, and the enterprising railway corporation under them, Canada owes a debt which it has not been niggard in acknowledging, for it has subjected itself to heavy financial burdens and been lavish in the grants of public land it has given the Company, to enable the enterprise to succeed and to facilitate its speedy construction. While we fairly, as we think, take this credit to the country, we at the same time pay our tribute to the great railway corporation for its unexampled labours on behalf of Canada and the Empire. What these labours mean, those know who are familiar with the engineering difficulties overcome in the construction of the road, and not alone in the "sea of mountains" on the Pacific, but over the desolate wastes on the north shore of Lake Superior. Not only has the road opened up to commerce and settlement the vast regions of the North-West, and linked together the distant and long-strung-out Provinces of the Dominion, but in its military aspect it has been and will be of high service to the Imperial Government in providing a new and expeditions highway to the Far East.

The expedition with which the road has been built is not the least striking feature in the story. Work was commenced upon it by the Stephen-Smith Syndicate in 1881, and ten years were given the company to complete it. Notwithstanding the gigantic character of the undertaking, and the apparently insurmountable difficulties in raising the necessary capital, the company was able, as we know, to finish the road and open it for traffic in the summer of 1836! The road, from Montreal to Vancouver, is 2,900 miles long, and trains make the journey between these once far-separated points in a little more than a hundred hours. The equipment and comfort—even luxury—of travel by the road are the theme of every traveller's praise. Its connections, extending eastward from Montreal to the Atlantic, are further instances of the enterprise of the company and of the facilities which this national undertaking affords. To enable the reader unfamiliar with the facts to form something like an adequate conception of this gigantic work, which is the crowning feature in Sir John Macdonald's public career, let us quote briefly from the railway authorities themselves. The quotation may serve, further, to indicate the conscientious thoroughness with which the company has carried out its bargain with the country:—

“The energies of the company have not been confined to the mere fulfilment of its contract with the Government. Much more was done in order that the railway might fully serve its purpose as a commercial enterprise. Independent connections with the Atlantic seaboard were secured by the purchase of lines leading eastward to Montreal and Quebec; branch lines to the chief centres of trade in Eastern Canada were provided by purchase and construction, to collect and distribute the traffic of the main line; and other branch lines were built in the North-West for the development of the great prairies.

“The close of 1885 found the company, not yet five years old, in possession of no less than 4,315 miles of railway, including the longest continuous line in the world, extending from Quebec and Montreal all the way across the continent to the Pacific Ocean, a distance of 3,050 miles; and by the mid-summer of 1886 all this vast system was fully equipped and fairly working throughout. Villages and towns and even cities followed close upon the heels of the line-builders; the forests were cleared away, the prairie's soil was turned over, mines were opened, and even before the last rail was in place the completed sections were carrying a large and profitable traffic. The touch of the young giant of the North was felt upon the world's commerce almost before his existence was known; and, not content with the trade of the golden shores of the Pacific, from California to Alaska, his arms have already stretched out across that broad ocean and grasped the teas and silks of China and Japan to exchange them for the fabrics of Europe."

It is time, however, to fall back on our narrative and pick up the threads of the history in connection with this great enterprise. After the collapse of Sir Hugh Allan's overtures for the construction of the railway, not a few politicians shook their heads ominously and said that the Canadian Pacific road would never be built. Session after session had been frittered away in Parliament in the attempt to get one body or another of capitalists to assume the task and so get it off the hands of the country. Mr. Mackenzie had spent large sums in making the necessary surveys, which, of course, had to precede construction, and in so far were a legitimate expense: not so legitimate, however, at least not so profitable, was the money spent in advertising for construction companies to undertake the work, none of whom were competent to do so. One of his offers was a proposal by a company to grapple with the project at a cost to the country of $10,000 and 20,000 acres of land for every mile constructed; but when engineers looked at the magnitude of the task in the Rocky Mountain section, the capitalists put their hands in their pockets and walked away. Notwithstanding the failure to get rid of the burden, Mr. Mackenzie, however, did what was possible, but the possible of that day was a meagre little in comparison with the achievement which has now to be detailed.

On the 29th of June, 1881, a political pic-nic was held at Bath, Ontario, at which Sir John Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, and other public men of lesser note attended. At this mid-summer festival an important announcement was made, which—we say it with all reverence—reminds us that it is often to the humble and lowly that great tidings first come. To the simple folk gathered about the Cnief-tain at this pic-nic, Sir John Macdonald made the announcement that there was at that moment in Ottawa a number of capitalists who were negotiating with the Government, of which he was the head, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Prime Minister's weighty statement was immediately flashed over the country. For a brief season it produced much depression in Reform circles, and in the Conservative camp there was no end of jubilation. Soon it was announced that negotiations had reached a stage justifying a visit of Ministers to England. Thither Sir John and some of his colleagues went, conferred with a number of capitalists in the moon, and, with considerable importance and an air of deep mystery, yet with manifest triumph, returned to Canada. The newspapers are irrepressible. Despite the silence of Ministers, these useful gatherers of information one morning announced that a syndicate or combination of capitalists, of abundant resources, and the highest financial repute, had been formed to undertake the construction of the road, and that for such work the Government had pledged itself to give $25,000,000 in money and 25,000,000 acres of land. The journals of the country were not misinformed; such indeed were the facts. Of course, those who a few months before had shaken their heads and declared that the road would never be built, that no company could be induced to undertake the work, unless for a sum which would mean ruin to the country, that the lands in the North-West, except for a fertile stretch along the valley of the Saskatchewan, were of little value, being visited by destructive frosts in summer and by devastating storms of snow in winter, were now the first—even before they knew the actual terms of the contract—to scream out that the Government had made an ignominious surrender to the Company, that they had given a sum of money fabulously large, and made over lands that would turn railway magnates into territorial kings; in short, that the financial future of Canada and the commercial future of the North-West were bound hand and foot and given over to the Syndicate. It is true, the money subvention to the Company was large, and large, too, the land grant by which it was supplemented. But large—vast, indeed,—was at the same time the undertaking; and though the country has since generously extended the aid given to the Company, and in all respects been considerate to it, the Government were quite justified in their liberal dealings with the road. At times there has been fear of undue influence on the part of the Company, in extorting concessions from the Administration not always in the country's interest. In the future there may be more fear still of this: but it will be the duty of the Opposition to see that these demands and all undue pressure of whatever sort are not carried too far; and if the Opposition fail in their duty, there will still be a check applied, we hope, by the watchful voice of public opinion.

But the contract had to be submitted to Parliament and by proxy be ratified by the country. A Session of the House was called early in December, about two months before the usual time of meeting, and great was the excitement occasioned by the summons. Sir John met the assembled wisdom of the country with his usual confidence, though it has since leaked out that he had some misgiving, for the proposed money-grant was large, and the fears of the country had been actively excited by their opponents. Between factiousness and funk there was indeed some occasion for apprehension. Mr. Blake led off by declaring that an undertaking so prodigious as this and so full of moment to the country should be approached with coolness and deliberation. This was true; but it was hardly the way to secure a judicial verdict on the matter by first exciting the people from the hustings and by creating a prejudice against the enterprise. Parliament, at all events, was now to deal with the Syndicate, and it was certainly more fit to deal with it, and with the whole question, than the body of the people, stirred up by partisanship and largely misinformed of the actual facts from the hustings. Parliament, however, was not then to decide; it heard an inkling of the Ministerial policy, and Sir John Macdonald was too wise to attempt to hurry the issue; back therefore the matter went to the people. The Christmas holidays intervened, and the House took a recess from the 23rd of December till the 4th of January.

CHAPTER XXVI.

CLOSING YEARS—THE LAMP GOES OUT.

BRIEF must be our summary of the events in the closing years of Sir John Macdonald's career. Nor is there need, while our space rapidly contracts, to take up time with the recital of matters of political history with which most readers are familiar. Contemporary themes, moreover, are of less interest to the nation than to the individual. The chief topics yet to be discussed are the General Election of 1887 and that of the present year, the readjustment of representation in the Commons, the Ontario Boundary Question, the North-West Rebellion, and the diplomatic correspondence with the Home Government concerning Canada's relations with the United States. Before coming to these topics, let us clear the sheet of those, minor though they be, that claim some attention.

During the session of 1882, Sir John Macdonald brought in a Bill providing for a readjustment of representation in the House of Commons. By the British North America Act it is provided that a census shall be taken every ten years; that Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members; that there shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population, ascertained at each census, as the number of sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec, so ascertained. The census of 1881 showed that Quebec contained a population of 1,359,027, which divided by sixty-five gave 20,908 as the limit of representation, Ontario which was found to contain 1,923,228 souls was, therefore, entitled to ninety-two members. By virtue of an expected rather than an actual population it was decided to give one additional representative to Manitoba.*

It was therefore necessary, according to law, to reconstruct and redistribute a number of elective ridings in Ontario, but months before the bill was brought in, reform speakers and writers declared that Sir John, in view of the pending general election, would carve the constituencies in such a way as to strengthen his own hands. They even averred that he had declared to several of his friends that he was going to "hive the Grits." So when the measure was brought in, the opposition set up a shout of dissent. They declared that every principle which should have guided in readjustment had been ignored; that in taking away from one riding and adding to another, topographical and municipal considerations were utterly disregarded, the only plain aim kept in view being the strengthening of doubtful constituencies, the adding of strongly reform sections to other districts where the liberal vote conspicuously predominated, thus agglomerating or "hiving" their opponents, while, wherever practicable, a sure majority—according to the election returns—was left to the Conservative riding. Mr. Blake believed that Sir John had dishonestly taken advantage of his position to recast, in his own favour, the whole political geography of the province, so that it was with a pardonable indignation that he characterised the action of the Ministry as "high-handed, arbitrary and unjust." Mr. Blake moved, in amendment to the Bill, the following, but the motion was lost by a vote of 111 to 51:—

"That the principle of observing, as far as possible, the limits of the municipal counties in adjusting the Parliamentary representation is sound

* In Ontario the small electoral divisions of Niagara and Cornwall were merged respectively in the counties of Lincoln and Stormont, their names being retained in the designations, "Lincoln and Niagara" and "Cornwall and Stormont." In the following manner were the six new constituencies created: Essex was divided into two, Lambton into two, Bruce instead of two divisions was given three; Middlesex instead of three was given four; Simcoe and Ontario, which had previously been divided into two, were now, each divided into three. The greater number of the other constituencies were readjusted; or "carved" as the Reformers described it. In Manitoba the old constituencies were slightly rearranged; and the added member was given to Winnipeg.

and should be followed in the said Bill for the reason given by Sir John A. Macdonald (in a recited speech on the subject in 1872), and approved by Parliament; and also because it affords some safeguard against the abuse of power by the party in office to adjust the representation unfairly towards their opponents. That the said Bill is framed in utter violation and total disregard of the said principle, since it takes away territory from the municipal counties for electoral purposes, and conjoins for electoral purposes territories having no municipal county relations with each other in a very large proportion of the constituencies of Ontario; while, at the same time, it does not effect the proposed object of equalising the population of the electoral districts."

It has to be admitted that the ministerial reply to Mr. Blake's powerful review of the question was somewhat unsatisfactory. Sir John's chief defence was this:—"The measure is a fair one; it is a Bill which equalizes the population, which acknowledges the principle (representation by population), which was pressed to a successful completion by the liberal party—the old reform party of Canada—and which since that time has been adopted by all parties, having the true principle, the real basis of representative institutions." Opponents of government exhibited maps showing the newly-constructed ridings, and they much more resembled the work of nature than of man. Some supporters of government affected to see nothing unfair or irregular in this political map-making, but declared the Act, which came to be called the "Gerrymander," a "blunder as well as a crime."

Although one year of the usual Parliamentary term was yet unexpired, Sir John resolved to make an appeal to the country. The Opposition declared that his fortunes having touched the meridian were now sadly on the decline, and that he feared to encounter the likelihood of defeat by waiting another year. But the Prime Minister was ready with two reasons for the proceeding, contained in the closing paragraph of the speech from the throne: "I heartily congratulate you on the rapid and successful development of our manufacturing, agricultural and other industries. I am, however, advised that their progress would have been still greater were it not that capitalists hesitate to embark their means in undertakings which would be injured, if not destroyed, by a change in the trade and fiscal policy adopted by you in 1879. In order, therefore, to give the people, without further delay, an opportunity of expressing their deliberate opinion on this policy, and at the same time to bring into operation the measure for the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, it is my intention to cause this parliament to be dissolved at an early day."

All through the summer we find the old Chief potent, as of yore, through the constituencies. He was not at this period as vigorous physically as he used to be, but his intellectual force, his tact, his fertility of expedients, and his power to compel zeal in his cause have in nowise forsaken him. "There he is in the thick of the fray with the light of other days in his eyes, still wielding that subtle and irresistible fascination over the crowds who have gathered to hear him. Always clear-voiced, always turning, always watching; he pours out that succession of argument, of wit, of joke and of story, many of them old, of flashes of thought, many of them new and bright, of political reminiscence and political fact, rambling yet not unconnected, and always bearing straight on the point, all of which have, for many a long year past, among Canadian populace or in Canadian legislature, been more powerful than the voice of other living man." Though the ideal politician of the majority, yet the old chief's welcome was far from being as warm, the crowds that gathered around him were far from being as large or as enthusiastic as in 1878. But the reason was plain. In 1878 depression had touched everything, and the crowds who gathered to hear Sir John were often largely composed of men who wanted bread, and who could only find employment by expatriation. They did not want work or bread now, and if, for a moment, they forgot the past, the unforgetful chief did not choose to permit them to disremember. "The last time I addressed you, he said, you cried out for work. I told you that better times would come, if legislation could bring them, if you would elect us. You did elect us. The better times have come, whatever brought them. I recognize before me the faces of my old friends; but you have better coats on, better hats on, better boots on than when you assembled to hear me last." Conservative speakers everywhere stood fast upon the good ship National Policy which had before carried them on the wave's-top to office.

In the party led by Mr. Blake there was lacking loyalty to one another, there was discord upon the question of National Policy, some declaring their preference for the fiscal system of the Government. "Mr. Blake went out to Durham and told the people that 'free trade is for us impossible.' Mr. Mackenzie raised his voice in East York and assured the electors that any doctrine but that of free trade was pernicious, retrogressive, and a relic of commercial barbarism. And so, an era of Reform speech-collisions began all over the country, and the enemy made the most of the clashing declarations. Thus it came to pass that the leader of the Opposition could scarcely make utterance on any question that a counter statement made somewhere else by Mr. Mackenzie, by Mr. Mills, or the Toronto Globe, did not rise like the ghost of Banquo to confront him; and vice versa. Each party pressed into service everything that could do duty as a conjurer of religious or provincial prejudice; the Reformers carried through the land a huge Bleu Frenchman, who, they said, was at once the master of the ministry and the ministry itself, and this Bête Bleu; they affirmed, to be jealous of the growth of Ontario, and bent on preventing her further development. It was at his dictation, they declared, that the ministry refused to ratify the boundary award, and they called upon the "men of Ontario" to come to the polls and defend their Province from the jealousy of 'these domineering Frenchmen.' Another important Opposition cry was the alleged tendency of the Premier to a centralization of all important political power at Ottawa; and proof of this allegation, they averred, was found in the disallowance by the federal parliament of certain provincial acts of purely local importance. It was pointed out, too, that Sir John, at a meeting of Conservatives held in Toronto, had spoken with marked contempt of the functions of local legislatures, and described Mr. Mowat, the Premier of the most important Province in the Confederation as being engaged in 'whittling at little provincial bills,' and had threatened to strip him of some of the authority with which he then was clothed. These were two strong cries against the government in Ontario; yet, owing to a more zealous and coherent party loyalty, to superior organization, and a more marked unanimity of opinion than that of their opponents, added to the advantages always possessed by the party who holds the reins, the Conservatives were re-chosen by a majority of about seventy over their opponents. The only provinces that did not send conspicuous majorities to support the Government were Manitoba and Prince Edward Island."

Several important changes were made in the Cabinet after the general election. Mr. John Carling, of London, became post-master-general in the room of the Hon. John O'Connor who retired from public life; Mr. John Costigan of Victoria, New Brunswick, became Minister of Inland Revenue in the stead of the Hon. J. C. Aikens, who was appointed to the Lieutenant-Governorship of Manitoba, and Mr. A. W. McLellan assumed the charge of the department of Marine and Fisheries, made vacant by the protracted illness of the Hon. J. C. Pope.

A frequent visitor upon the floor of the House of Commons during the next few years was the question of the Northern and Western boundary of Ontario. In 1878 by mutual consent the Governments of the Dominion and of Ontario appointed three gentlemen, Sir Francis Hincks, Chief Justice Harrison, and Sir Edward Thornton, who were authorized to collect all available evidence, and from this ascertain where lay the Northern and Western boundary of Ontario. All possible evidence was collected and considered, after which the arbitration submitted its finding, or its award, as so many of the controversialists insisted upon terming it. It is as well at the outset to understand that the function of the arbitration was only to collect evidence, and from its interpretation thereof to ascertain the boundary. That it was to declare, absurdity itself only could suppose, since it was merely an agent of Government. But Mr. Mackenzie makes the position of Government clear upon the point when in express terms he reserves the right to withhold ratification for sufficient reasons. The award reached the Privy Council shortly after the resurrected ministry had taken their seats ; but the following session passed, another came and went, still another and another, yet Government made no sign of giving validity to the binding of the arbitration. Meanwhile affairs in the large tract of debatable territory were in serious confusion ; the inhabitants knew not whether they belonged to Ontario or Manitoba, or to which they should make prayer for relief from municipal disabilities—to whom they should look for the building of roads and bridges, and the establishment of schools. Ontario, whose interests had momentous connection with the ratification of the finding, began to cry out that Sir John was delaying justice to her, and solicited him to bring the question before Parliament and settle it there. Her legislature, as if to set an example, favourably passed a measure ratifying the declaration of the arbitrators ; still the Premier made no move. He took the ground that the finding of the arbitrators was in no way binding upon parliament, but that the duty of these gentlemen was rather to declare a conventional line than to give an authoritative decision upon a question that was a matter of law ; that in advance of parliamentary sanction, it was not only highly inexpedient, but transcended the powers of the government of the day, to refer to arbitration the question of the extent of the North-west territories acquired by the Dominion by purchase from the Hudson's Bay Company ; that the duty of the Government was to seek for a disposal of the matter as a question of law ; and that his Government was prepared to submit the question for decision to the Superior Court of Canada, a tribunal whose raison d'être was to deal with disputed inter-provincial questions ; or, this proposal failing, to meet the wishes of his opponents by handing the case to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council. The Reformers replied that this was only a shift to evade ratification of a valid declaration made by a competent tribunal, and they refused the First Minister's proposals. On the 21st of November, 1881, Sir John Macdonald visited Mr. Mowat, the Premier of Ontario, in the latter's office, and there in presence of the Minister of Justice proposed that "the Government of the Dominion and that of Ontario, should unite in soliciting the good offices of some eminent English law-functionary for the purpose of determining the true boundary line";* and—such proposal not being acceptable—to submit the question either to the Supreme Court of Canada or to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council.

The Prime Minister was now charged with being under the Bleu influence of his Cabinet, of being afraid to forfeit their support by doing justice to Ontario. But Sir John saw, notwithstanding delays, that justice would eventually be done, and to this end he proposed a transfer of the case to a disinterested tribunal whose declaration he would bind himself to accept. It probably was true that Ministers from Quebec looked with extreme disfavour upon a finding that would give to Ontario increased possibilities of still further overshadowing their own Province, but they were powerless to obstruct the case once in the hands of the Privy Council, or even in our own Supreme Court of law. It would have been better, no doubt, and saved much turmoil and hardship had Sir John found himself able at once to give validity to the finding of the arbitration, but again and again he declared that he did not believe the method urged upon him to be the constitutional way. Ascertaining his opinions and his attitude it was clearly then the duty of Mr. Mowat to have at once accepted the proposal of a reference to the Privy Council. This impartiality and the ability of this tribunal being above any question, there was no ground to apprehend either a denial or a delay of justice. During the summer of 1884, however, a modus vivendi was reached between the Premiers of Ontario and Manitoba, and it was agreed to take the advice Sir John had given so often and refer the case to the Privy Council. After careful consideration the binding of the arbitrators was ratified and this disturbing question was set at rest.

* Vide a despatch from the Secretary of State to the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, January, 27th, 1882.

On the 23rd of May, in the session of 1883, Sir John Macdonald moved an address to His Excellency Lord Lorne expressive of the admiration and good-will of parliament for His Lordship, whose term of office had then nearly expired. The address received the cordial and unanimous support of both Houses of Parliament; after which it was presented to His Excellency by Sir John, accompanied by other members of the Cabinet. In his last speech, closing parliament, His Lordship said, and the words came not from his lips but from his heart: "The severance of my official connection with Canada does not lessen the ties of affection which will ever make me desire to serve this country." In saying this His Excellency was only speaking the modest truth. On more than one occasion, since leaving us, he has by pen and tongue shown that he has a deep love for Canada and a sincere regard for her welfare.

The establishment of the Royal Academy of Arts will remain a testimony to the interest in art taken by their Excellencies; but the founding of the Royal Society of Literature is, we fear, not likely to testify to its founder's practical sagacity.

The Marquis of Lorne was succeeded in the Governor-Generalship by the Marquis of Lansdowne, who had won for himself an honorable if not a conspicuous place in public life in England. Like his predecessor, the new Governor was a nobleman who came to Canada desirous of doing his duty. "The manly, unstilted and appealing character of his utterances in the chief cities of the Dominion where he appeared; his frank, unpretentious address, and the spirit and vivacity with which he entered into his new calling, and sought to familiarize himself with all events, political and social, won for him universal approbation, kind feeling, and esteem." Lord Lansdowne possessed in an eminent degree the high traditional qualities of an English gentleman. While in Canada he did honour to the office he filled and left behind him a gracious memory. In appointing him to the Governor-Generalship of India, the Crown fittingly rewarded 'a good and faithful servant.'

In speaking of the events, in these closing years of Sir John Macdonald's administration, it is to be noted that in the year 1884 the most able minister of the Cabinet, next to the Premier, retired from Canadian public life to devote himself to the duties of the office of Canadian High Commissioner at the Court of St James. To this latter office Sir Charles Tupper was appointed on the first of June, 1883, a vacancy having been created by the recall, at his own request, of Sir Alexander T. Galt. It is fitting here also to record the compliment that was paid Sir John Macdonald, in the banquet given under the auspices of the Junior Conservative Club of Montreal, early in the year 1885. The demonstration marked two important events in the Premier's long and distinguished career—one, the attaining of his seventieth birthday; the other, the commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the great Parliamentarian's entrance into public life. The banquet was attended, we are told, by the largest number of political notabilities ever assembled at a social gathering in Canada. Its occurrence was a gratifying and spontaneous manifestation of popular regard, and well was it deserved. Equally well deserved was the honour which his Imperial Mistress paid him a little while before the banquet took place. In the autumn of the previous year Sir John was in England, and there the crowning honour of his life was conferred on him—the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath. The distinction was conferred by Her Majesty, herself, "in acknowledgment of long and distinguished services." At the banquet, Sir John made the statement that the first intimation he had had of intention to confer the honour was by a communication received from the then Premier, Mr. Gladstone. The intimation, coming from this source, was most gratifying to the Canadian statesman, for, as he put it, "he (Mr. Gladstone) knew that I was a Conservative, and he was a Liberal. He knew that I was a supporter of the National Policy, and he was a Free Trader." Alas! that only for some six years after this was the gratified recipient of the G. C. B. to enjoy the honour of it.

The year 1885 put a great and severe strain upon the resources and the integrity of the Canadian Dominion. The cause of this was the outbreak of the rebellion in the North-West, which, but for its prompt and heroic suppression by the Canadian Militia, might have entailed far more serious consequences than befell the country. Serious, however, the consequences were, both in blood and treasure. Calamitous was the loss of life which it occasioned, and millions of money were required to suppress it.

The disturbance was the unhappy sequel of a lawless ambition ungratified, further played upon by race jealousies, and by impatience at the neglect of a distant, and, in this special case, not over-considerate government. In the chapter on "The Half-Breed," Louis Riel, the leader of this new insurrectionary movement, has been introduced to the reader. This firebrand, having unluckily been relieved of the consequences of his despotic usurpation in the Red River Settlement in 1869-70, had for a number of years resided in exile, in Montana. There, however, he had not purged himself of either the taint of treason or of the infection that led him still to coquet with it. He not only maintained communication with his old rebel following, now removed to new holdings on the Saskatchewan, but nursed the illusion that the gods had again destined him to play the rôle of the prophet-deliverer. His mission was to free his half-breed kinsmen from Anglo-Saxon and Protestant ascendancy and possible domination in the prairies of the North-West. From the period of the acquisition of the Territories by the Dominion, the French half-breed had always deemed himself aggrieved at the opening of the region to colonization and settlement. He wanted the country conserved as the happy hunting-ground of his race. The settler he looked upon with jealous eye, and with more than jealous eye he looked upon the surveyor. The latter indeed was his bête-noir: he not only resented his intrusion, but clamoured to have him withdrawn. Giving free scope to his prejudices, he resisted the new laying-out of his lands, and in irate mood he individually and collectively appealed to Ottawa. Ottawa unfortunately disregarded the appeal. The Department continuing deaf to the call for the redress of his grievances, the Spirit of Evil got hold of him, and, bringing Riel on the scene, he and his took to revolt. This occurred in the spring of 1885, while the snow was yet on the ground, and before the rich soil of the prairies had thrown up anew its sweet-scented life.

Very startling to the people of the East was the news that rebellion had broken out on the Saskatchewan, and, at Duck Lake, had ventured upon its first overt act. This was on the 26th of March, 1885. The events that followed this Indian and Half-breed defiance of constituted authority in the North-West are too familiar to the reader to need going into. From the outset the emeute was serious. It meant not only lawlessness and looting, but wide-spread disaffection and murder. What had occurred was appalling enough; but no one knew how far the rising would spread: there was a fear that it might extend to the Indians. Thanks to the militia organization, the public mind was in a measure relieved by the ready response to the Government's call for the service of the troops. In an incredibly short time 3000 of the militia of the country were under arms and dispatched to the scene of the disturbance. The facilities of transport were furnished by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, then nearing the completion of its great highway to the Far West. For three months, as we know, the eyes of all Canada were centered on the divisions in the field of General Middleton's expeditionary force. How great was the mind-tension of the country throughout the campaign, is recalled to us in the memories of Fish Creek, Cut Knife Hill, and Batoche. With the fall of the rebel stronghold, on the 12th of May, harrowing anxiety was over, though the public mind did not experience relief until the return of the troops. What followed was to give Riel and his accomplices in rebellion a fair but speedy trial, and that and a merited fate were the award of swift-footed justice. The protracted political excitement in the French Province, occasioned by the execution of Riel, needs hardly to be dwelt upon, save to chronicle its occurrence. It was long an embarrassment to the Government, and is still, unhappily to-day, a brand in the hand of party. Fortunately for the Administration, this is all it has had to contend with. It suffered nothing from the inquiry in Parliament into the matter of responsibility for the outbreak. In the prosecution of the inquiry, Party overreached itself, and there was nothing to do but to foot the bill and wipe remembrance of the affair from the public slate.

The year 1886 was without marked adventure in the annals of the Dominion. But for the action of the Opposition in Parliament, in moving ineffective votes of censure upon the Government for the maladministration of affairs in the North-West and the execution of Riel, history would have a placid record to show, in sharp contrast to the state of apprehension and disquiet of the previous year. In 1887, Canadian loyalty fervently joined the Motherland and the wide circle of the Empire in celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of Her Majesty's beneficent reign. It can hardly be said, however, that the Dominion Legislature gave the keynote of enthusiasm for the Queen's Jubilee, for in the previous year it passed a Resolution enjoining the Imperial Parliament to grant self-government to Ireland, which, were Home Rule to be conceded, would strike a blow at the integrity and honour of the United Kingdom. The action of the Commons in this matter was warranted neither by the reception given to the Dominion Resolutions of 1872, nor, as it turns out, by the trend of events and the drift of public opinion in England since. The Resolutions, it is to be feared, only served to mark the difficulty of bringing about unanimity of action and feeling in matters relating to Imperial administration, and the unlikelihood of England submitting to dictation or being benefited by the counsels of her widely-separated colonies.

On the 15th of January, 1887, the fifth Parliament of the Dominion was dissolved, and in the general election that ensued Sir John Macdonald and his Liberal-Conservative Government were once more sustained at the polls. Sir John very naturally plumed himself upon this new endorsement by the people, and inferred from it that the National Policy, however much it might be objected to, was in the main in accord with the desires of the country. This may in part be admitted, though in estimating results something has to be conceded to the strength of a Government in power, with the patronage and other agencies, actual and potential, of office at its disposal. The times, it is also to be said, had picked up since the N. P. was inaugurated, and business interests had been formed round it which were averse from a policy that would have unsettled them. The Pacific Railway, moreover, was getting on its feet, and though in the North-West the rule of the Company was for a time inimical to the interests of the region, the stringency of monopoly was wisely relaxed and more liberal views prevailed. The economical situation, however, was not, on the whole, good. Protection had not been favourable to commercial relations with the United States, while irritating questions of international diplomacy had vexed the air, both at Ottawa and at Washington. Nor were matters in this respect improved when the General Election of 1891 was brought on. The N. P. in restricting trade with our natural markets had done nothing to make good the loss elsewhere; nor, reciprocity being the condition of extended trade, could it well do so. What inter-Provincial commerce could be secured has of course been taken advantage of and fostered, but to this there have been obvious limits. Unrestricted Reciprocity with our neighbours was a policy alien to the N. P., and Party has stepped in to make it more alien to the Ottawa administration. This, it is believed, however, is the growing want of the country, and it was emphatically urged at an inter-Provincial Conference, of a notable character, held at Quebec in the autumn of 1887. It has been urged still more generally since. Nor, if properly viewed, would unrestricted reciprocity be disadvantageous to the manufactures that have been legitimately fostered in the country. Such a change as this would involve, in the fiscal policy of Canada, as our readers know, has not been entertained by the Government. It has contented itself with making a nominal offer of reciprocity to the United States, but on conditions which the Washington authorities cannot be expected to approve. On the other hand, the Government of the United States, or rather the House of Representatives, at the instance of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, has put on record its willingness to appoint a commission to consider the subject in a friendly spirit, whenever our Government deem it wise to agree to a joint Conference.

In 1888, Lord Lansdowne's term of office having expired, the Governor-Generalship was assumed by Lord Stanley of Preston. His Excellency was appointed on the 1st of May, and took the oath of office on the 11th of June. The new Governor-General, who is the second son of the late Earl of Derby, was formerly English Secretary of State for the Colonies, and President of the Board of Trade. In the same year, some changes occurred in the Dominion Cabinet, which may here be noticed. The Hon. G. E. Foster, who had held the office of Minister of Marine and Fisheries since 1885, was now given that of Finance. The portfolio of Mr. Foster's vacated office was given to the Hon. C. H. Tupper, son of the present High Commissioner. The Hon. J. G. Haggart became Postmaster-General, and the Hon. Edgar Dewdney, Minister of the Interior. The latter office had just been made vacant by the lamented death of the Hon. Thomas White, one of the most promising and beloved of Sir John Macdonald's Ministers. Mr. White held his portfolio for three years, and was an ideal chief of a department which made great demands upon a conscientious and hard-working public officer. In the previous year (1887), Lieut.-Col. the Hon. J. J. C. Abbott, D.C.L., Q.C., now Premier of the Dominion, was called to the Senate and appointed a member of the Privy Council. From 1887 up to the other day, when he was entrusted by His Excellency with the formation of a new administration, Mr. Abbott acted as leader of the Government in the Senate. It should have been earlier chronicled that, in 1885, Sir John S. D. Thompson was appointed Minister of Justice, in succession to Sir Alexander Campbell, who was made Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario. It is hardly necessary to say that Sir John Thompson brings rare gifts to his high office, and is perhaps the ablest member of the present administration.

The last three years of Sir John Macdonald's Premiership, happily for the dear "Old Man," ran, on the whole, smoothly with him. Even Time seems to have made a compact with life's waning forces to treat him graciously. Politically, the breath of public favour continued to fill his sails, though recent years increased the complexity, if they did not diminish the crop, of subjects disturbing to his administration. With the Party system it becomes increasingly difficult to deal with questions of race and religion in Canada, and with these, added to sectional strife and the ever-growing religious and economical problems, Canadian statesmanship seems to be doomed always to deal. In the settling of these questions, even Sir John Macdonald would have admitted, Party was not a happy solvent. Yet Party was the sole instrument—the only one possible, it was thought—with which to handle them. Every reflecting man, however, must see that with the heterogeneous elements of race and creed with which we have to contend in Canada, government, other than corrupt and truckling, is almost impossible on the Party system. It may seem pessimistic to say this; but can optimism lay its hand on its heart and affirm that the system has not been, is not evil, and that, with its continuance, the national outlook is fair and hopeful? With Party Government, can it be said that the country has an assuring confidence that its administration and direction are nationward, and, if nationward, that we are on the highest and noblest lines of advancement? Under it are we weaving for ourselves the best political and the purest social outfit for the future? With its rule, is there among the different communities that compose the Dominion a common ground on which to unite and weld our people together as a nation? We might go further and ask if there is even an aspiration shared in common? Are not the Provinces still isolated from each other, full of jealousies and estrangements, and absorbed in the ceaseless struggle, not for the highest interests of the commonwealth, but for the selfish objects of racial and religious dominānce, plus "better terms" and local rights?

But this is by no means all that can be said of the evils of party rule in Canada. Other aspects of it will occur to the reflecting reader and furnish material, as we believe, for its honest arraignment. It may be profitless now, even for illustration, to recall the recent Jesuits Estates' imbroglio, which plunged the country into a seething cauldron of strife, alienation and bitterness. In that unhappy matter, did we not owe to Party the violation of the principle of Equal Right, and the putting of the public conscience under the heel of political expediency? For the present, it may be wise though not patriotic to say, that we must get on as best we can in Canada with the Party system. We, however, sincerely and honestly dislike it, and deplore its evils; but we refer to it here, not to be censorious, still less to "air a fad," but to show the difficulty of governing such a country as ours under the system. Its fruits are sufficiently manifest in our politics and in the methods alike of those who are in office and those who are out of office. It is responsible, in the main, for all that we cannot honestly commend in the administration of the deceased Premier. We owe to its malign influence our large public debt and the heavy fiscal imports that burden the people. We owe to it the corruption that has disgraced the country and lowered the tone of public life. We owe to it, in the Press, the Platform, and the Forum, the evil reign of vituperation and calumny. It has created discord in the nation, set politician against politician, journal against journal, class against class. It has degraded the name of loyalty by causing men to be branded as "disloyal" for seeking, without ulterior object, to widen the bounds of trade, stop the exodus of labour, and bring prosperity and happiness to the homes of the people. We repeat, that for the present, we suppose, it must be borne with; but soon the sum of its evils must end and displace the system. Already there are prospects of a change. The pledges wrung by the exigencies of Party from the Government and its supporters in the last election, must now be forfeited or redeemed. Is there the wherewithal to redeem them? If in honour they must be met, the country will know, or ought to know, what they are;

and, knowing this, will get a further insight into the methods by which we are governed. Will it profit by having its eyes opened to the expense, to say nothing of the morality, of the system ?

The passing away of Sir John Macdonald leaves the future a sealed book. Even the morrow has its cloud of perplexity and gloom. His work ends with him, and the new era falls to other hands. Despite the system under which he laboured, and not a little that was objectionable in his methods, the shears of fate cut him off from much beneficent work done for his country. Whatever were his failings, Canada will not forget the debt of gratitude it owes to him. Its people will repay this, not only by being kind to his memory, but by being true to the country he served and loved. The individual dies, the nation lives.

THE LAMP GOES OUT.

It is not without a feeling of pensiveness that one comes to review the final stage in the career of a man who, like Sir John Macdonald, has been for nearly half a century intimately connected with the life and progress of a nation, and who for the best part of that time has had the 'blue-peter' of success flying at his mizen-mast, to be hauled down at last only by the relentless hand of Death. Cold would be the nature of the writer, who, in looking back over these fifty years in the militant life of Canada's greatest statesman, felt no emotion as he recalled the living interest of that life in all the events of the era which for him and his country is now forever closed. The living interest has ceased, but the memory of the man lives on,—the memory of all he did and said, and strove to say and do. He around whom all the party battles of these turbulent years had been fought has fallen ; and distraught is the look on every face as it gives mute utterance to the despairing words, "Sir John is no more !" No one better than he understood Canada and his own time, or was more facile in taking advantage of his knowledge and opportunities. Intimately, also, did he know the people and their moods, over when Destiny had called him to preside. Now that he has gone, great do we see was his personal ascendancy. The gap he has left, it seems, for the time at least, impossible to fill. This is not the result entirely of the Chieftain's own natural abilities, great admittedly as they were. It is the result rather of education in the mind-sharpening school of statecraft, combined with a clever aptness in the art of personally governing, of a ready power of gauging contemporary thought on the political topics that interested the people, and of consummate skill in shaping in harmony with it the policy of the hour. In these respects, high—little indeed short of genius—were his qualifications as a leader. To be unreasonably admired by one generation, remarks a writer, is to incur the certainty of being unreasonably disparaged by the next. It is too soon, as yet, to say what will be the final estimate of Sir John Macdonald's work and character. There can be little question, however, of the regard in which he was held, while in life, by the mass of his countrymen, as there can be little question of the sincerity of the grief manifested on all sides when his career closed. Friend and foe alike have already borne testimony to the greatness of the man. The eloquent leader of the Opposition did him no more than justice when, in the House the other day, he spoke of his death as a national loss, and characterized the deceased statesman as "Canada's most illustrious son." Though Mr. Laurier's political views compelled him to differ with Sir John Macdonald on many matters which he deemed vital to the interests of Canada, he freely admitted that his actions—to quote the eulogist's own words—"displayed unbounded fertility of resource, a high level of intellectual perception, and, above all, a far-reaching vision beyond the events of the day, and, still higher and permeating the whole, a broad patriotism in seeking Canada's welfare, Canada's advancement, and Canada's glory." These kindly and sympathetic words are the graceful tribute, not only of a member of the House, who had long known the deceased statesman, but of one, as we know and have said, whose conscientious convictions had ranged him in opposition to the great Conservative leader. May we not also say, that they voice the opinion of the country at large, at least of all who, of whatever stripe of politics, can rise above the prejudices of party and recognize in the young nation's long-time and chief ruler those gifts and qualities that go to the making of a great statesman?

Hardly less fervid are the words of the Hon. Senator Abbott, who has since been called by His Excellency, the Governor-General, to the Premiership of the Dominion. In the Senate, on the morrow of Sir John Macdonald's death, Mr. Abbott paid this tribute to the deceased statesman's memory :

MR. SPEAKER :—It is unnecessary for me to-day to make any formal announcement of the event which has filled the Dominion with mourning. You all know we lost on Saturday night the statesman who has filled the highest place in the councils of this country for a great number of years. His loss has not only filled this country with mourning, but it has been heard with feelings of keen regret amongst thousands of people who live beyond our borders, and who knew him only by the great reputation—a continental reputation—which he had. The statesman who for so many years has held the foremost place in the councils of our country, and, I may say, a not inferior place in the hearts of its people, has departed from us. I cannot trust myself on this occasion, nor, indeed, would it perhaps be fitting, that I should enter on any detailed discussion of the career of the great man whose loss we deplore ; but, though that may not be appropriate on this occasion, though it could not, perhaps, be dealt with as it ought on this occasion, yet we all know what we have lost, and all parties concur in their deep sense of that loss, to whatever race or party they belong. Honourable gentlemen know, the whole country knows, that we have lost a statesman of transcendent ability, who devoted his whole energies, with a singleness of purpose, and with success, to the building up of this great Dominion, to its consolidation, to its aggrandisement, to the promotion of its material prosperity, and to constituting it a foundation for a great nation to rule over the northern half of this continent. I know, all of us know, that in the performance of that great work, and the great responsibility that fell upon him as head of the country for so many years, he built for himself a reputation, not only on this continent, but in England, scarcely second to any statesman who has sat in the councils of the Empire. * * * * In all his public life his characteristics were those which we are taught, and I hope which we will never forget, to admire and imitate. That is the statesman we have lost ; but we have also lost a friend, who is enshrined in the hearts of the whole people. No man probably ever lived who had so strongly with him the sympathies and efforts of the people, a people constituted as ours is, divided by race, divided by religion, divided by habits, divided by politics, yet personally he was the friend of every man in the country, and every man in the country regarded him with affection as well as with friendship. Sir John Macdonald lived during the greater part of his life with unparalleled facilities for amassing wealth; he died a comparatively poor man. None of his bitterest enemies in the greatest and most violent heat of the most violent political debate, ever accused him of using his personal power for his personal advantage. These are the characteristics of the man we have lost. I know I speak in accordance with the feeling of every man in this Senate, and perhaps of nearly every man in the country, when I say that we regret and deplore his loss, and moreover, that we sympathize with our whole hearts in the bereavement of those near and dear to him, who suffer from it even more materially than his country.

Journalism, too, was not behind the Senate in laying its immortelles on the Patriot Statesman's tomb. We make two quotations from the Press tributes, one each from the chief journals of the two great cities of Canada, Montreal and Toronto. The following is from the Montreal Gazette:—

“Compared with his life during the last twenty-four years, the great statesman's early career seems unimportant. Confederation did, indeed, greatly enlarge the influence and the responsibilities of the Government. For three-fourths of the entire period he was Prime Minister of the Dominion. But he assumed the leadership of the first Dominion Cabinet as a statesman of well tried ability, of broad views, and intensely patriotic. Some of the ablest men that Canada has produced were proud to call themselves his followers. Sir George Cartier, the trusted leader of the Conservatives of this province, had been in turn his chief and his lieutenant, under the old co-ordinate system of the Union period. The leading men in the sister provinces readily acknowledged his rare gifts, and when the quartette of colonies that first composed the Dominion looked around for the one man who would, as Premier, inaugurate the new rule, the majorities did not hesitate to fix upon Sir John A. Macdonald. This confidence he retained to the last. There never was even a thought, in the Conservative party, of setting up a rival to Sir John Macdonald, so long as he had health and strength and will to guide its course. There never was even a hesitation as to the recognition of his supremacy; and to this loyal unanimity must be attributed the fact that he and his colleagues were able to accomplish so much, to accomplish what under no other circumstances could have been accomplished.

“If he was powerful at the beginning of this later period, he was indisputably supreme in the confidence and affections of the people at the close of it. His was one of those intellects which go on maturing during a life-time. Prosperity and adversity had alike tended to develop his rare faculties. Even after his climacteric was past and his physical powers began to fail, his mind continued to ripen and to yield fresh harvests of policy for the advancement of the country. He was the most direct and practical of statesmen. He always seemed, by an intuitive prescience, to discover the pivotal point of the situation, and, that point once ascertained, he could not be diverted to side issues. There are, doubtless, persons who insist that this is not the highest type of statesmanship—that the man of that type is ever something of a Falkland, seeing with pained philosophic ken all the sides of a question and ready to balance various contingencies against his own assured convictions. Such a Falkland (especially in a democracy) loses while he hesitates. The highest type of statesman, who is at once philosophic and practical, sees the whole range of possibility at a glance and makes his decision promptly—a decision based on intimate knowledge of his people and their needs and of the extent and availability of his own resources (including faithful and willing helpers) for the carrying out of his plans. Rarely, indeed, have the broadest views, the grandest aspirations, the most devoted patriotism, the loftiest ideal of nationhood been combined with such clear-sightedness of aim, such a common-sense judgment, and such remarkable executive ability as in Sir John Macdonald. The schemes which he made accomplished facts would in an inferior statesman have been condemned as chimerical. But in Sir John achievement even outran aspiration, because he had faith in Canada, in her people, in her resources, and in the men whom he chose to be his co-workers.

“In another year the Dominion, whose foundation will be forever pre-eminently associated with Sir John Macdonald’s name and services, will have passed the test of twenty-five years of existence. From the rejoicings of that season of anniversaries the great minister will be sadly missed; but with the birth of the Dominion and its development during that first quarter century his name will be forever associated.”

We take this extract from an able and appreciative editorial, characteristic of independent journalism, in the Toronto Mail:—

“It must be left to History, which applies in due time the test to all men’s works, to form an impartial estimate of the remarkable figure who has just passed away. The fierceness of the party conflict, the injustice meted out to men and methods, the scantiness of the materials upon which to base a fair judgment with regard to some events of his life, render it impossible to expect at this stage of the country’s bereavement an accurate measure of the loss we have sustained. Yet there are many features in Sir John's career which already stamp the man, and lend to him a character which will ever attach to his name. The eminence to which he rose, and the fame which he enjoyed, not only in his own country, but in Great Britain and the United States, are forcible testimonies to his individuality and his power. Never did a colonial statesman before him win for himself in the Mother Country so high a position in the minds of the public there. * * * Sir John, through the service he had been enabled to render the Empire in facilitating the confederation of the provinces, in assisting at the Washington negotiations, and in undertaking the construction of the continental line, brought himself into touch with the higher powers in England, and secured for himself there a reputation for sagacity and enterprise of which he might well be proud. He has indeed ranked in England as the greatest of her Majesty's subjects in the colonies. Not less for his policy in relation to the Empire than for his works has he been respected and honoured at home. Eminently conservative—for the first act in his public career was to oppose the abolition of the law of primogeniture in Canada—he was also a thorough Imperialist. He spoke from his heart when he declared in 1878 that should the British flag cease to fly over Canada he would immediately abandon the country. Similarly his more recent announcement, "A British subject I was born; a British subject I will die," was no mere formula. It may be that the expression reflected harshly upon his opponents. But he meant what he said, for he had dedicated himself to the furtherance of the British idea on this continent, which we may well believe he regarded as the best basis for our national future. To the English statesman and publicist Sir John Macdonald's name, though it has been associated with tariff legislation of which the British manufacturer has complained, has of late been the symbol of the tie which connects us with the Mother Land. But fame beyond our borders could not have been won without the good will and the strong support of the people of Canada. For no matter how faithful Sir John might have been personally to the Crown and the flag, he would have wanted the opportunity to display his fidelity had the Dominion not been behind him."

But space forbids us to extend these quotations. Nor is there need that we should do so. They speak the sentiments not only of the writers, and the journals they represent, but, we venture to think, those also of all ranks and classes throughout the Dominion. Adherents of the party opposed to the dead Chieftain will doubtless make mental reservations, and qualify, in some particulars, it may be, what has been spoken and written. But few, we imagine, will deny to the subject of these eulogies the right which, by life-long service to the country is his, of being esteemed the foremost figure in the last fifty years of Canadian history, and one of the most faithful and patriotic workers for the well-being and advancement of the nation. The dominant note in all Sir John Macdonald's measures and policy was the aggrandizement of Canada. In seeking this, his work is well-nigh unsurpassed in the qualities and characteristics that go to secure and hold what he both wrought and sought. Throughout his career he was essentially a popular statesman. There was little of the philosopher, and less of the doctrinaire, in his politics. The soundest common sense marked all his parliamentary utterances. Usually they were clear as to statement, and when party exigencies did not intervene, they were frankly and effectively presented. Sir John was not an orator, though at times he could rise to the height of an impassioned and telling argument. On occasion, he could be dignified and impressive; but it would be misleading to say that he elevated the tone of debate. The scuffle of party in the House too often forbade that. He trusted more to his urbanity of manner, his unflinching good temper, and the genial and winning qualities of his heart. What he could not influence with these, he thought was little worth influencing. He loved power, but his love of it was more for the benefit of his friends than for himself. His appointments to the Bench show him to have had a sense of moral right above that with which party had made him familiar. In this, he paid a tribute to the judiciary which his relations with political clerics would not warrant us in saying he paid to the Church. He was a man in whose ambitions there was little that was paltry, and absolutely nothing that was sordid. When the critic is apt to be censorious, or the historian yields to the alien bias of a mood, let him remember that.

CHAPTER XXVII.

LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH.

DURING the early days of the present session of Parliament there were distressing rumors about the Premier's condition. It was said that he had suffered a renewal of the attack which had compelled him to suspend active participation in the election campaign. Heart failure was hinted at, and the whole country felt uneasy. At Ottawa, where the politicians to whom Sir John's life meant so much, were assembled, the excitement, though suppressed, was intense. Sir John struggled bravely against approaching fate, and declined to listen to those who pleaded with him to take more thought of himself and to refrain from active participation in the exceedingly lively parliamentary conflict that was being waged. He was at length compelled to absent himself from the House, but he did not even then refrain from attending to public business. On Thursday, May 28th, there was much anxiety, despite the hopeful tone of the morning papers, but it soon became noised about that Sir John had passed a restful night, that he was stronger and better in every way. There was universal joy at this announcement. In the middle of the forenoon the first bulletin was issued. It read as follows :

EARNSCLIFFE, May 29th.

10 a. m.—The Premier passed a quiet and comfortable night, and this morning his physical strength shows distinct improvement since yesterday.

R. W. POWELL, M. D.

This served to allay all fears, eagerly sought after as was the news. The bulletin was displayed in the main corridor of the House of Commons, and was quickly scanned, not only by the members themselves, but by every representative of the press gallery, every attaché of the House, by messengers sent from the different departments, and many private citizens, who readily climbed Capitol hill to make sure that the leader they all loved and served was doing well. Fondly they hoped that a few days would witness a return of his usual strength and vitality; but, alas, these hopes were vain.

Sir John felt much refreshed by his night's rest, and the guiding impulse of his life to work was strong within him. He wrote a letter to Postmaster-General Haggart, and, it is said, to one or two others, and then sent for the Minister of Justice, who was quickly in attendance. Sir John Thompson talked with him for an hour, and the Premier showed that his grasp of public questions had not in the least diminished. He appeared wonderfully bright when the Minister of Justice left him. At noon the patient had a short nap, from which he awoke apparently refreshed. The first hours of the afternoon he spent quietly with Lady Macdonald, the Premier's son, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, M.P., of Winnipeg, being also present. Dr. Powell, the faithful medical attendant, called at 4 o'clock and found his distinguished patient doing well in every particular. He sat with Sir John a few minutes, and while the doctor was actually sitting at the bed-side conversing with his patient the change came. It was hemorrhage of the brain, an extravasation of blood upon the organ, the effect of which is paralysis.

Dr. Powell, seeing the gravity of the situation, at once sent for further medical assistance, and Sir James Grant, M.D., and Dr. H. P. Wright, two of Ottawa's foremost physicians, were quickly in attendance. Practically they could do nothing for the distinguished patient. They remained in consultation and ministrations until after 8 o'clock, during which time Sir John steadily grew worse. The effect of the attack was to paralyze in part the right side. This paralysis was not sufficient to affect the limbs perceptibly, but it deprived the Premier of the power of speech. The great chief lay on his bed for hours quite conscious, but utterly unable to speak. Time and again he would make an attempt to give utterance to the thoughts that were evidently passing through his yet active brain, but without success. Lady Macdonald, his devoted wife, was by his bedside, as was also his son. At eight o'clock another bulletin was issued. It read as follows :

EARNSCLIFFE, May 29th, 1891.

8 p.m.—Sir John Macdonald suffered a relapse this afternoon while I was with him at 4:15 p.m. He is quite conscious at present, but his condition is most critical.

R. W. POWELL, M.D.

Already more or less alarming rumours of impending danger had circulated in the lobbies of Parliament, where, of course, the Premier's condition was most anxiously canvassed.

The first news of the Premier's relapse which reached the House was brought by the Empire reporter, who carried to Sir Hector Langevin a personal note from one of the consulting physicians. This appalling message read as follows: "I have just seen Sir John in consultation; entire loss of speech; hemorrhage into the brain; condition quite hopeless." With this note came the bulletin which was subsequently posted up in the main lobby. It was shortly after 8 o'clock when Sir Hector was given the note, and he took it and read it with nervous anxiety. Rapidly the news spread from bench to bench on the Government side, among the first to spread it being Mr. Montague, of Haldimand. "As he passed from tier to tier of seats," says the Empire reporter, in describing the scene, "it was pathetic to observe the pain which came over the faces of the Conservative members." At the time, adds the journalist, Sir Richard Cartwright was making his attack upon Sir Charles Tupper and the man who had then lost all consciousness of the political realm in which he had been so conspicuous a figure.

"As the news became general all interest in the debate ceased. The lobbies were filled as they had only been once before this session, and under ordinary circumstances the House would have been ringing with cheers and counter-cheers. But one by one the members passed out to wait for the next bulletin, or gathered in knots near the back row of benches on the Ministerial side. Dr. Landerkin saw that some unusual news was being passed from mouth to mouth and he crossed the floor to inquire what it was. When he “returned to the Opposition side and told his confrères what had caused the commotion across the House, there began the same scene in the benches at the back of Mr. Laurier. The people who were crowded into the galleries up to this time, dividing their attention between the debate and the gossip of the hour, also became aroused to the fact that an extraordinary pall had fallen upon the House. They became silent. They caught the same inexpressible solemnity that was creeping over every one in the House, which is only felt when one stands in the presence of a great and overpowering calamity.”

Mr. Charles Mackintosh, M.P., was now speaking. Sir Hector Langevin and the members of the Cabinet saw that it would be useless to carry the debate any further. They found themselves pressed by eager questions from member after member, who, hoping against hope, wished to learn if there was not some feeble chance that the latest news might not be as bad as it had reached their ears. But Sir Hector and his colleagues were unable to hold out the slightest hope. A majority of the Cabinet then withdrew to consult, necessarily with haste, as to what course should be taken in respect of the proceedings in the House. Meanwhile Mr. Fred White, the Premier's former private secretary and closest friend, came to the House with further news, crushing out the last spark of hope which might have been kept alive since the bulletin of 8 o'clock was posted in the lobby. In effect he said that the chieftain was barely conscious and in a state of collapse. He had been trying to speak, but failed. Mr. White at once saw Sir Hector, and told him that Sir John had been absolutely given up by the doctors, who said he could live but a few hours at most. This news at once brought the Ministers to the decision that the House must be adjourned. Sir Hector walked across to Mr. Laurier and made him acquainted with the information that had come from Earnsliffe. Mr. Laurier at once consented to second both the adjournment of the debate and the adjournment of the House. There was a brief pause. After the Ministers were in their seats, and before Mr. Mackintosh ceased speaking, or had well taken his seat, Sir Hector rose, and in a low, tremulous and almost inaudible tone said: "Mr. Speaker, I have a painful duty to perform. The news we have had from Earncliffe is that the First Minister has had a relapse, and that he is in a most critical condition. We have had reports from the medical men, and they do not seem to believe that he can live many hours more. Under these circumstances I move, seconded by Mr. Laurier, that the debate be adjourned." As Sir Hector rose it was apparent that his statement had been anticipated. In an instant a strange and impressive silence came over the House. Every ear was strained to catch his words, and when he ceased speaking a sigh passed through the chamber. Then Mr. Laurier rose and said: "Under such circumstances, the painful duty devolves upon me to second the motion of my honourable friend. The country will be shocked to hear the sad news. It seems impossible to carry on the business, and I, therefore, agree to this motion." This motion and the motion to adjourn the House were carried.

The Empire reporter thus describes the scene that followed:

"When the speaker had left the chair a scene which will long be remembered for its painful solemnity took place. Sir Hector was immediately surrounded by a score of members, who plied him with questions as to what the doctors really said, and how long the Premier might be expected to live. They spoke in whispers, and took in many cases a suggestive shake of the head for an answer. By a common instinct the conviction settled itself over the House, that the event which all knew to be inevitable within the compass of a few years had at last come. More than three-fourths of the members remained in the chamber. Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, who had been talking to several members in the rear row of seats, walked down to his place with his handkerchief to his eyes, and utterly unable to speak. The tears streamed down Sir Hector's cheeks, as he said: 'For thirty-three years I have been his follower.' * * * * *

"The members of the press gallery immediately left their places and a majority of them entered the Chamber. There “ was scarcely room to move about on the floor of the House. “ Every one was eager to hear the latest news from Earnscliffe. “ But there was nothing new to be learned there. The Premier “ was dying, and that was all that could be said.”

Immediately after the 8 p.m. bulletin was posted in the House of Commons lobby, and Sir Hector had made his announcement in the Chamber, cabs were speeding towards Earnscliffe bearing with them anxious individuals, including the Ministers of the Crown, and many members of Parliament.

At 11 o'clock the following bulletin was issued :

EARNSLIFFE, 11 p.m.

Sir John's condition still continues very precarious ; loss of power of speech ; respiration and circulation weak ; rest somewhat better than during the afternoon ; takes a moderate degree of liquid nourishment.

(Signed) R. W. POWELL,
J. A. GRANT,
H. P. WRIGHT.

At the same hour his Excellency the Governor-General, who, since he took up his residence in the Dominion, had become a firm friend of the Premier's, came from Government House to inquire after the First Minister's condition.

At 2 a.m. on Saturday all was quiet about Earnscliffe. Dr. Powell, the attendant physician, said : “ There is no change in the Premier's condition. He is resting quietly.” Long after midnight Sir John wakened from a doze. Looking around he reached his hand out towards the bell, made a motion as if to strike it and motioned his head towards the door. He could not speak, but the action spoke as plainly as words. It meant that everybody was to go to bed and he would ring the bell if he wanted anything.

The whole country was in possession of the sad news on Saturday morning. Every newspaper had the announcement under display head lines. “ Sir John is dying ! ” Everywhere the blow to the country was the sole subject of conversation. It was with the greatest possible anxiety that the people awaited further information. The watchers at Earnscliffe had their counterparts all over the Dominion. In Ottawa all through the night there was a constant stream of inquirers pouring down Sussex Street. The representatives of newspapers had no rest. The press room at the House of Commons was open all night, and the telegraph instruments in the adjoining rooms clicked away steadily hour after hour; cabs rushed to and fro; correspondents hurried in and out; reporters drove at break-neck pace hither and thither, for the time was short, and much had to be done.

At 3:30 a.m. Sir John awakened from a sleep and took some nourishment. Then he dozed off again, and Lady Macdonald, who had been watching at his bedside all night, took a walk on the lawn to get a breath of the fresh morning air. Dr. Powell rose at 5 and made a thorough examination of his patient. The result was the following bulletin:

EARNSCLIFFE, Saturday, 6 a.m.

The Premier passed the night quietly and had short sleeping intervals. He suffered no pain and is perfectly conscious in that he is able to make known his wants to those about him. Intelligent speech is yet in abeyance. He has taken milk at intervals.

(Signed) R. W. POWELL, M.D.

The stream of callers set in early in the morning, but means were taken to prevent the passing of vehicles to disturb the patient, and provision was made also that those in attendance should be relieved of all the strain possible. The people showed marked good taste as well as kindly sympathy; and while all were anxious to learn the beloved Premier's condition, they refrained from unnecessarily embarrassing by their presence those who were thus called upon so suddenly to discharge the exceedingly onerous duties of receiving visitors and giving information. At 10:30 Sir James Grant and Dr. Wright arrived, and had a consultation with Dr. Powell. Sir John at that hour, it was stated, was perfectly conscious, and, though dozing frequently, opened his eyes at every sound. A step on the gravel was sufficient to awaken him. As nearly as possible absolute quiet was maintained. As a result of the consultation, the following bulletin was issued:

EARNSCLIFFE, 1:40 a.m.

The Premier passed as comfortable a night as could have been expected, and this morning, at our consultation at 11 o'clock, we find his general symptoms unaltered from yesterday. Our opinion of yesterday remains unaltered.

(Signed) R. W. POWELL, M.D.,
J. A. GRANT, M.D.,
H. P. WRIGHT, M.D.

At 4 o'clock the physicians again met in consultation. Meantime, visitors who came to the gate were informed that there was no change. After the consultation this bulletin appeared:

EARNSCLIFFE, 4:30 p.m.

Sir John has been resting quietly all day, and has had several intervals of natural sleep. He has taken liquid nourishment in small quantities. He is still conscious, and knows those about him, but speech has not returned in the slightest since his stroke of yesterday afternoon. Any change in his condition will at once be announced.

Among the very few admitted to the sick room was Ven. Archdeacon Lauder. He called both in the morning and afternoon in his pastoral character. About 5 o'clock four members of the Cabinet walked down to Earncliffe. They remained but a short time. During the afternoon his Excellency Lord Stanley of Preston drove over with a cable message from the Queen, personally, and remained at Earncliffe for an hour. What the Queen did in sending a message of anxious inquiry hundreds and thousands of her subjects, from the highest to the lowest, were constantly doing. Secretaries were busily engaged answering telegrams from every part of the Dominion, from Britain, the United States and elsewhere. One of the Old Chieftain's greatest friends, was the Princess Louise. When Lord Lorne was Governor-General of Canada and the Princess resided at Rideau Hall, she learned to value the kindly nature as well as to appreciate the keen intellect of the Premier, and since leaving Canada more or less correspondence was maintained between the two. Sir John's advice has many times been sought by the Princess. On Friday morning, before the attack had become serious, a cable message was received from the Princess asking as to his health. The Premier dictated a reply, stating that he was out of danger. Then came the stroke, and on Saturday came another message, which read :

LONDON, May 30th.

Much moved at report of Sir John's severe illness. Trust he is improving.

LOUISE.

Politicians, railway magnates, ministers of the Gospel, business men, personal friends of all classes, sent in messages of sympathy and inquiry. The whole country, as it were, watched at the dying Premier's bedside. Intimate personal friends in different parts of the country, on learning the sad news, started at once for Ottawa. Lady Tilley, wife of the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, telegraphed that they were ready to leave St. John for Ottawa if better news was not received. Mrs. Hugh John Macdonald, who had been in Toronto, arrived on Saturday evening. She was dressing to attend a ball when a telegram arrived announcing the stroke that had fallen upon her illustrious father-in-law. Upon arriving at Ottawa she at once drove to Earnscliffe, where her assiduous attentions were much appreciated. Hon. Frank Smith was one of those who left at once for Ottawa on learning the news. Others also sought the Capital with all speed. Every arrival was chronicled by the press and served to increase both the gloom and the excitement at Ottawa.

At 11 p.m. the doctors held another consultation and issued a bulletin which contained nothing new except the ominous words : " His general condition is lower." The fact that the Premier had held out so long despite the predictions that he would live for only a few hours, had caused hope to rise in the breasts of many, and the intimation that he was sinking, made the people who watched so anxiously sick at heart. As mirroring the feeling of the time, the sympathetic account of the Empire reporter may be further quoted :

" Up stairs lay the dying Statesman with Lady Macdonald, " Mr. and Mrs. Hugh John Macdonald, and Dr. Powell by his " bedside. In attendance were : Mr. Joseph Pope, the private " secretary ; Mr. Fred. White, comptroller of the North-West " Mounted Police, and one of Sir John's most confidential “ friends ; Mr. John Hall, secretary of the Department of the Interior, an adopted son of the chieftain ; Mr. Baird, the assistant secretary ; Mr. Sparks, Mr. Fortescue and Policeman Stewart, a brawny guard, whose chief duty is to assist in turning the sick man in his bed.

“ Presently through the gate walked two gentlemen, one a tall, erect, brown-bearded man. It was the Governor-General, Lord Stanley of Preston, who had walked over from Rideau Hall to cable the latest news to Balmoral. He was accompanied by Major Colville, his chief A.D.C. Mr. Pope and Mr. White hurried out of the house and the four remained out upon the lawn. There was the situation : The dying Premier of the Dominion, the Governor-General of Canada in attendance at the express command of the Queen of the British Empire, that she might have the latest news of the condition of the man she had so often honoured. Through Lord Stanley, the greatest Queen on earth extended her sympathy to the foremost of colonial Statesmen.”

And thus the time passed and a new week began, the last the veteran Premier was to see. To record the events of that week is not easy. It was the battle of a strong man against Death, it was the conflict of one whose determined will had overcome all obstacles, who had even met the Grim Conqueror himself some twenty years before and had driven him back by sheer force of his marvellous vitality. But those twenty years of busy life, of anxieties of statecraft and turmoil of political struggling had made the difference between victory and defeat, and now the Scythe-bearer was pressing his victim closer and closer every hour. There was no hope, the doctors knew that. And yet there were those who did hope that the physicians might be mistaken and that the loved and honoured head of the nation would, after all, repeat his victories of yore.

At six o'clock on Sunday morning, the 31st May, the doctors issued a bulletin announcing that the patient had passed a quiet night, without event of any kind to record. But the bulletin also said : “ His general powers of life are waning.

Consciousness, while waning, is still preserved to him." The day wore on and the patient remained about as before, his strength astonishing all who were acquainted with such cases, especially the physicians in attendance who had the opportunity of gauging accurately his condition. The principal duty of the watchers by the bedside during the day was to administer nourishment to Sir John and occasionally to change his position. The services of Mr. Stewart, of the Dominion Police Force, were constantly in requisition. Broad shouldered, brawny and big-hearted, strong as a lion, but gentle as a lamb, in Stewart's arms the Premier was as a little child. When asked to indicate how he would like to be placed Sir John was told to squeeze the hand of Stewart or the doctor, whoever happened to be the questioner. Supposing he desired to recline on his right side, he would give a strong grip, while if he preferred the opposite position the chieftain would refrain from pressure, but always when he was composed the old man's kindly nature would beam out in a grateful pressure of the hand of attendant or doctor.

The day passed on, the events changing little from the day before, so far as Earnscliffe and Ottawa were concerned. Outside, in every church in Canada practically, prayers were offered up for the Premier's life and for his restoration to health. The announcement of his condition, according to the latest bulletin, was made at the evening service in hundreds of churches, in order that, so far as possible, the public anxiety might be allayed and the natural longing for news on the one absorbing topic gratified. This is how the bulletin read:—

EARNSLIFFE, May 31, 10.30 p.m.

The Premier passed a quiet day, and we find no marked alteration in his general symptoms. He retains consciousness much as in the past two days, and is free from suffering.

J. A. GRANT, M.D.

H. P. WRIGHT, M.D.

It may be well to pause here to give the following brief account of the cause of the sudden as well as sad stroke which laid the Premier low. It is a professional summary of the facts:

Sir John's position may be put in a few words. The ruptured blood vessel in the substance of the brain has left a minute clot to press upon the centre of nervous power. That clot is the cause of paralysis. The tendency of a vigorous constitution is to slowly absorb this tiny bubble of coagulated blood and relieve the pressure; but no human eye can see whether that process has begun or not. On the other hand, should this deadly circle suddenly begin to expand, the Premier would pass away at once. The clot has reached the utmost limit at which life can be sustained at all. Thus, the physicians can only look on, while endeavouring to keep up the patient's strength, but utterly powerless to reach the centre of danger. With them the question is whether nature will triumph or the pressure on the centre of life increase. All are agreed, however that the immediate absorption of this clot in the brain or its reduction would only give the Premier a precarious lease of life. Sir John has probably gone beyond recall. Should even the power to speak return, there are good reasons for believing that his predominant characteristics and marvellous acuteness of intellect would never come back. The vital cord has been drawn out to its highest tension, and on the slightest additional strain must snap.

On Monday morning the train of anxious visitors to Earncliffe was resumed, while from all over the country the people looked anxiously for the first news. They were informed by the bulletin at 6.45 that Sir John had slept more than usual during the night, and that at intervals his heart's action became very weak, but there was no change in the symptoms. At 11 o'clock the bulletin told of "an unmistakable lowering of the vital forces," and caused still greater gloom and depression in Ottawa as well as throughout the whole country. At 6 p.m. there was "no change," but the newspaper reports stated that the tide of life seemed fast ebbing. At 11.45 p.m. the consoling fact was announced that the patient suffered no pain, and that there was every prospect of his living throughout the night.

SIR JOHN THOMPSON.

On Tuesday there were not wanting those outside who allowed themselves to hope that after all the wonderful "Old Man" would drive the enemy back, and the newspapers of the following day found some ground for expressing this feeling. But there was nothing in the announcements made by the physicians to form a basis for the slightest comfort. They were evidently drafted so as to cause as little excitement as possible, but those who read each bulletin without reference to the others might succeed in maintaining a delusive hope. At 6 a.m. the absence of the severe depression which had manifested itself on the previous day was noted, but when the physicians saw that the people used this to buoy up their hopes they took care in the bulletin at 11 a.m. to say: "While we are gratified to find such an exhibition of vital strength as we see exemplified in him, yet we cannot alter our opinion as to the final result of his illness." There was no alteration until 7 o'clock, when the physicians were pained to notice a change for the worse, and a decided lowering of the vital forces. When the announcement was made in the House of Commons, which was then in session, it caused the greatest excitement, and led to an immediate adjournment. As rumours had spread that the sick room was not guarded against intrusion as it should have been, the following semi-official announcement was telegraphed from Ottawa to the Empire:

"In consequence of the absurd rumours current in some newspapers as to the persons who obtain access to the Premier in his illness, the Empire is authorized from Earncliffe to state distinctly that no one has admission to Sir John's sick room but Lady Macdonald, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh John Macdonald, Mrs. Dewdney, Mrs. Fitzgibbon, Miss Marjorie Stuart, Sir John's two secretaries (Messrs. Pope and Baird), Mr. Fred. White and Mr. George Sparks. The sick room is entirely under the control of Dr. Robert Powell, who is never many minutes absent from it, and who is assisted in the actual nursing only by Lady Macdonald and Mr. James Stewart, of the Dominion police force, a valuable man-nurse. The other attendants divide into regular watches by day and night, and assist by going in and out of the chamber for such things as are there required. The utmost quiet and regularity are observed."

During the day the illness of Sir John Macdonald was mentioned in the British House of Commons, and was the occasion of several graceful tributes to the abilities and virtues of the dying Premier. Right Hon. W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury, said: "Sir John Macdonald is a man who, however his party conduct may be viewed, has earned the respect and admiration of all who know the services he has rendered to the Dominion and the Empire. There can be but one feeling, of deep sorrow, that a life so valuable seems about to end." Sir William Vernón Harcourt, Mr. Staveley Hill, and Hon. Joseph Chamberlain joined in the tribute to Sir John Macdonald, whose death, they all said, would be an international loss. The House generally showed keen sympathy with Canada.

Wednesday passed much as the other days had done since the blow which was ultimately to result in death had fallen. The Premier's marvellous vitality was that which occasioned the most comment. There was a demand from outside, especially from physicians who followed the case with greater intelligence but not with greater anxiety than the people at large, that the patient's pulse and respiration should be given. This wish was complied with. The morning bulletin showed the respiration to be 28; "pulse irritable, 120." After the afternoon consultation it was announced that the patient's condition was lower than at the same hour on the previous day; in the evening the pulse was 120, respiration 30. Just before midnight the bulletin announced, "the patient, on the whole, exhibits less strength. Respiration, 28; pulse, 100, flabby, compressible and very irregular." The following was one of the many newspaper despatches sent from Ottawa on Wednesday:—

"The condition of the Premier is not generally understood. The repeated announcement that he is conscious and able to take nourishment has led to the impression here and elsewhere that there are grounds for believing he can recover. But the degree of consciousness is so slight and the volume of nourishment so small that these announcements should be accepted with wide qualification. Beyond the signals which he is able to give upon matters affecting his immediate physical comfort, Sir John has not since Friday last communicated a single idea to anyone about him. That he knows those who are about him is probably true, but that he is able to appreciate either his circumstances or general surroundings is to be doubted. And yet, it is only natural that the fact of his survival to this hour should lead to the general notion that he must be getting better. A close analysis of the bulletins, however, shows that there has been a steady lowering of the nervous forces. That Sir John has not succumbed ere this is entirely due to the fact that his hold on life was stronger than his medical attendants believed it to be. The doctors could not say in advance how long he could endure the terrific strain to which he was subjected, and in judging his chances of living they merely measured his strength by the common standard. If, however, Sir John has been a remarkable man these fifty years and more, he has not ceased to be so when the hand of death closed about his heartstrings. Everyone now sees what inestimable stores of vital force the 'Old Man' has had to sustain him through all his wonderful career of restless activity and hard mental work."

Thursday saw the weary watch continued but with little more reason for hope than before. The patient had passed the night without change, taking nourishment as usual and sleeping a good deal. The hope of the country went up with a bound when, at their forenoon consultation, the doctors issued this bulletin:—

EARNSCLIFFE, June 4, 1891, 11.15 a.m.

Sir John Macdonald passed a fairly comfortable night and partook of nourishment at intervals. The cerebral symptoms are slightly improved at the time of our consultation, owing, doubtless, to the fact that having lived six days since his seizure partial absorption has had time to take place. The heart's action, however, is extremely feeble and very irregular, and its failure is at present the chief danger.

[Signed,]

R. W. POWELL, M.D.

J. A. GRANT, M.D.

H. P. WRIGHT, M.D.

One of the doctors explained, however, that this simply meant that there was less hope, the trouble merely changing from the head to the heart. In the evening, the bulletin told of "continuous weakness," and at night he was "slightly more conscious of his surroundings," but the heart's action was weaker.

As the week drew to its close so did the life of the great and beloved Premier. Dr. Geo. Ross, of Montreal, had been called in at the special desire of many friends of Sir John's family, and he arrived at noon. The result of the consultation of the four physicians was this hopelessly depressing bulletin:—

EARNSCLIFFE, June 5th, 2.45 p.m.

At our consultation to-day we found Sir John Macdonald altogether in a somewhat alarming state. His strength, which has gradually failed him during the past week, shows a marked decline since yesterday. He shows still a slight flickering of consciousness. Respiration, 38; pulse, 120, more feeble and irregular than heretofore. His hours of life are steadily waning.

(Signed) R. W. POWELL, M.D.

J. A. GRANT, M.D.

H. P. WRIGHT, M.D.

G. ROSS, M.D.

Then followed this announcement, increasing, if possible, the gloom and despair among the people:

EARNSCLIFFE, June 6th, 7 p.m.

Sir John's end is fast approaching; has been unconscious since 4 p. m.

(Signed) R. W. POWELL, M.D.

From this time on it was deemed simply a matter of hours to the anxious watchers expecting at any time the approach of death. At nine o'clock the physicians noticed a change and notified the family, who gathered round the bedside, conscious that the end was now at hand. His irregular and laboured breathing, which had been for hours a series of gasps and had now reached the rate of fifty-six a minute, ceased, and in its place there came a deep, regular and ordinary respiration. For another hour the terrible waiting and suspense continued. At last, without a struggle, his heart stopped beating, the breath of life left the body. Sir John Macdonald died at fifteen minutes past ten o'clock, on the night of June the sixth, 1891, aged seventy-six years and five months.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE FUNERAL.

NEVER in the history of Canada has the country been so profoundly stirred by the death of any man as by the death of him who had so long and so ably guided its course. Messages of condolence poured in from all parts of the world. The highest dignitaries in the realm, including Her Majesty the Queen, hastened to pay their tribute of respect to the memory of the dead.

The body was at once embalmed and clothed in the uniform of an Imperial Privy Councillor—the decorations he had received from the Sovereign he had served so long and so faithfully shining upon his breast. The arrangements for the funeral must have been extensive in any case, for all Canada desired to participate in it. But practically a double funeral had to be arranged for, because of the dead Premier's wish that he should be buried in the family plot, at Kingston, beside his parents, his sisters and his brother.

On Tuesday morning, at daybreak, the remains were removed to the Senate Chamber, where they lay in state until the next day, during which time thousands of people, including the most distinguished people from all parts of the country, visited the place to take a last look at the well-known features of Canada's great statesman. Many floral tributes were brought and laid beside the coffin. At night the body was watched by relays of Conservative Members of Parliament. When Wednesday morning came, the preparations for the great funeral pageant were early begun. Until noon, however, the surging crowds of mourners were allowed to enter the chamber and take a last look at the dead.

Shortly before the Senate Chamber was closed to the general public an incident occurred which must be regarded as the most significant since the body of the Premier was brought from Earnsliffe. At that moment Sir Casimir Gzowski walked slowly forward and placed on the casket a beautiful wreath of white and yellow roses from Her Majesty the Queen. Attached to the wreath was a card bearing this inscription :

From Her Majesty Queen Victoria,
In Memory of Her Faithful and Devoted Servant.

It is not remembered that Her Majesty has ever before sent any such tribute of affectionate regard to Canada or any other colony as a mark of her esteem for a public servant.

Meanwhile busy preparations for the funeral were going on outside. The hearse, drawn by four heavily caparisoned horses and richly set with plumes, had arrived. The Governor-General's Foot Guards, 350 strong; the 43rd Battalion, 150 strong, and the members of the Ottawa Field Battery, had marched in and were drawn up in long parallel lines down the eastern roadway. The bands of the two first-mentioned corps were also in readiness. In every direction there were moving masses of representative bodies in procession order, finding the places assigned to them. The grounds were black with onlookers. Contrary to the apprehension felt in some quarters, there was no disorder or wild scrambling for places. The original order of precedence was closely, though not absolutely, followed. An air of perfect reverence prevailed, and on every hand were heard the tenderest and most affectionate references to the great man in whose honour they had gathered.

The casket was closed shortly after 12 o'clock. At that hour the Senate chamber wore very much the same quiet air as in the early morning, with the exception that a staff of men were engaged in removing the floral offerings and placing them on the two cars which had been fitted up for that purpose. At precisely 1.15 o'clock the great bell in the tower gave the first signal for movement. Immediately afterward the bells on the City hall and churches took up the tolling, and kept it up until the funeral was over. At the striking of the tower bell six stalwart members of the Dominion police force raised the casket to their shoulders and the march to the main entrance began. In front went Chief Whips Taylor and Trow, bearing the wreath sent by Her Majesty the Queen, and behind the casket came Junior Whips Daly and Pope, carrying the wreath of His Excellency the Governor-General. The members of the late Cabinet, with Hon. J. C. Aikens, marched reverently on either side in their capacity as pall-bearers. The hearse was beneath the main tower, and towards that point the bearers slowly carried their honoured burden. As they came in sight the bands began the low and mournful strains of the Dead March in Saul. A solemn hush came over the great multitude and thousands of heads were bared. It was the work of but a few moments to place the casket in the hearse and lay upon it the memorial wreaths. Then the bands moved slowly forward and the funeral march to the church began.

Major Sherwood, chief marshal.

Squad of Dominion Police.

Carriages for the Pall-bearers.

Then followed the representatives of many municipalities and public organizations of all kinds, and after these, prominent citizens in their private capacity. Along the entire route of over a mile to St. Alban's Church, where the funeral service was to be read, the sidewalks were blocked with people, the majority citizens of Ottawa, but thousands also from outside, attracted by the greatness of the solemn event which was to mark the day as one to be remembered in the history of Canada. It was estimated that 8,000 men were in line and that 60,000 people watched the procession from the Senate Chamber to the Church. The day was intensely hot with that close, stifling heat which precedes a storm, and there was much suffering among the processionists and spectators.

The Church was magnificently decorated. The catafalque, under which the casket was to rest, was clothed in imperial purple. The two pillars nearest the altar had an embossed wreath of oak leaves and acorns, while the two nearest the main entrance had embossed leaves of laurel worked in bullion gold. The top drapery was festooned with gold braiding, with a background of three golden stars; below there appeared two wreaths of maple leaves entwined in gold and green. At the junction of each pillar with the canopy hung bannerets of purple and gold, bearing a centre design of the Greek lexicon, the Alpha and the Omega. The canopy itself was a covering of black and purple. The bier consisted of two mahogany pedestals, covered with a banner of royal purple and gold in front, having a representation of St. Alban the Martyr.

But there was one particular spot to which the eyes of the hundreds who visited the Church during the morning were directed with thoughts of sadness. Immediately in front of the reading-desk, the end seat next the centre wall in the second row was covered with purple and old gold, festooned in front, a wreath of smilax on the entry side. This was the seat which the great chieftain had occupied for so many years, and in the place where he had been accustomed to sit there rested to-day a superb cross of white and cream roses, tulips and immortelles, a gift from the following young ladies of St. Alban's: The Misses Taylor, Cross, White, Powell, Wallace, Bogert, Bacon, Landor, Wise, Mackintosh, Jarvis, and Bancroft. The baptismal font was filled with superb tropical plants of Yucca palm and ferns, and adorned with lilies and smilax. The entire edifice was touching in its sombre shadows, but beautiful in all its floral loveliness.

Among those in attendance at the church was Lady Stanley of Preston, wife of the Governor-General, who was accompanied by Lord Kilcourseie, A.D.C., Mrs. Colville and Mrs. Herbert, the ladies attired in deep mourning. The procession was most solemn and included nearly all, if not all, the Anglican clergy of the city. The coffin containing the remains of the dead Premier was borne in attended by the pall-bearers and followed by the relatives of the deceased, led by Mr. Hugh John Macdonald and his little son Jack, the Premier's only grandson. When all had been admitted for whom decorum demanded an assured place, the doors were thrown open and as many of the multitude outside as could find standing surged into the Church. The service was most solemn and impressive and all present joined in spirit in psalm and prayer over the mighty dead. The service was read by Rev. Mr. Bogert, incumbent of St. Alban's. The service concluded, the procession re-formed and the march to the station was begun. The gathering storm had come closer and was now imminent. The procession had not got half way to the station when the inky clouds broke in a terrific down-pour, scattering spectators and many of the pedestrians in the procession.

A special train had been made up to carry the remains and those who were to attend them to Kingston, and on the arrival of the cortege the coffin was reverently borne from the hearse to the car which had been prepared for its reception. The whole train was heavily draped in emblems of mourning. About a quarter past four the train started. At Carleton, Smith's Falls, and Sharbot Lake, where short stops were made, vast throngs of people were found assembled, thus paying the last tribute of love and respect for the Chieftain. At many smaller places the people turned out to see the train go by, and at wayside stations and farm houses men stood with heads uncovered as the train flew past.

It was twenty minutes past ten o'clock when the train rolled into Kingston with the mortal remains of the Old Limestone City's most distinguished son now nearing their last resting-place. An immense throng had assembled and were waiting patiently in solemn silence the coming of the dead. When the train ceased to move, the clock over the town hall began to toll, and the ringing continued for an hour. A battery was present in full force and formed two lines from the train to the City Hall. Eight constables stepped forward and received the casket, which was covered with magnificent wreaths and other floral tributes. The spectacle, as the procession moved from the train towards the building under the vivid glare of the electric light, was solemn in the extreme. First came Mayor Drennan, then the casket, members of the City Council, every member of the Cabinet, Senators, M.P.'s and friends from Ottawa. A squad of cadets was formed around the bier when the corpse arrived, and immediately they formed a body guard.

On the casket being deposited at the City Hall, the cover was quickly removed, and the guard of honor settled into position. Then the members of the Cabinet passed the coffin and viewed the face of their beloved Chieftain for the last time. Not one went through the ordeal with dry eyes. Some of them, particularly Sir Hector Langevin, were very much affected, and aged men were seen to weep as they proceeded on towards the means of exit. The sadness of the scene was remarked by many. Half an hour later the doors were thrown open and the crowds began to surge in. They passed in one door and out at another, so that confusion was avoided and thousands had their desire gratified. The passing to and fro was continued till midnight, at which time the crowd lessened and dispersed to their homes.

While this solemn ceremony was going on in alike the Capital and in the home of the Premier's boyhood, all Canada joined in spirit in honoring the dead. In every town and city business was suspended, while during the hours when the funeral procession was to take place bells tolled from church steeples throughout the whole Dominion.

On Thursday, the eleventh of June, the body of Canada's greatest statesman was to be laid away from mortal sight forever. Kingston was early astir. People from outside began to pour in soon after daybreak, and long before the hour fixed for the funeral the city was uncomfortably crowded. Yet so general was the impression of the importance of the occasion, so keen the sense of personal loss on the part of every man and woman who desired to take part in the ceremony, even as spectator, that the crowd never lost its character of a funeral assemblage.

As early as five o'clock that morning citizens began to hasten toward the city buildings, where the remains were lying in state. A continuous stream of people kept passing through the hall, and the crush was so great at times that the doors had to be closed. Soldiers and policemen were on hand to prevent confusion, but frequently they were unable to do so. The mayor estimated that fully 15,000 people viewed the remains before he gave the order to replace the lid on the casket. It was no uncommon thing to see old citizens weeping as they left the building. Had the funeral been postponed, the demand to view the remains would not have been satisfied within the day, as when the doors were closed at 12.30 p.m. thousands had collected in the streets in front of the hall intent on gaining admission.

At 1.30 o'clock Ontario Street in the neighborhood of the city hall was densely crowded. It was at that point and in the adjacent squares that the funeral procession was being organized by the civic officials. This was done quietly and with due regard for the solemn character of the proceedings. It was 2.45 p.m. when the casket was raised to the shoulders of eight men of A Battery and slowly borne to the street. It was preceded by the officiating clergymen and the pall-bearers. Instantly the bells began to toll with slow and regular strokes, and thousands of heads were bared. The hearse stood in the centre of the street awaiting its burden of distinguished clay. It was heavily draped and was drawn by eight horses from A Battery, suitably caparisoned and led by men in uniform. The casket having been placed in position and the wreaths of Her Majesty the Queen and His Excellency the Governor-General placed thereon, the officer in command gave the order to march. In low, plaintive tones the combined bands of A Battery and the 14th Prince of Wales' Own Rifles began a funeral dirge, and the cortege moved forward in regular order. As the wailing notes of the music were heard, an impressive hush came over the vast concourse in Princess Street, and they waited in patience for the sombre pageant to appear. As the procession moved into the main thoroughfare, running the full length of the city, it was observed to be

IN THE FOLLOWING ORDER :

Officers of the Canadian Militia in reversed order of seniority.

Then followed the representatives of municipal corporations headed by those of Kingston, clubs, organizations and societies of various kinds, including many from distant parts of the country.

Along the principal portion of Princess Street every available foot of ground not actually taken up by the marchers was occupied by spectators. The masses of people were not so great as at Ottawa, but they seemed greater for the reason that there was more concentration. The route lay along one street, and to that point the people of the city and thousands of visitors flocked. As the imposing procession moved along and the hearse passed by, every head was bared, and to the tribute of respectful silence there was in many cases added the tribute of loving tears. The drappings of mourning were general along the line of march, and were not limited at all to places of business. Some of the private houses were draped with emblems of sorrow. The distance to the cemetery was three full miles. This, with the return, was more than most walkers were able to undertake, loyal and loving as was their purpose, and hence, according to arrangement, they halted just outside the city limits and allowed the procession of vehicles to pass between their ranks. There were about a hundred of the marchers who considered no sacrifice too great for their chieftain, and they pushed onward to the cemetery. This brave contingent embraced a score or more of members, ex-members, and senators, as well as the full civic delegation from Ottawa.

Long hours before the funeral cortege came into view, people wended their way through the gates of the cemetery. A continuous stream of vehicles drove along the road from Kingston. The trains ran every hour, and hundreds walked the entire three miles rather than miss the closing scene in the career of the great chieftain. Over the undulating and beautifully kept grounds they swarmed to the hillside where is the family burying plot of the Macdonalds, and there they halted and massed in solid depth about the enclosure. The square plot has the usual iron railing, a square granite column with the names "Macdonald" and "Williamson" on the base, the grave of Mrs. Williamson, Sir John's sister, on the right, the grave of Sir John's father and mother on the left. Between the pillar and the mother's grave is that of the chieftain. The great stone flags in which the coffin was to be enclosed were all in place, save the two that composed the lid, which were held in position ready for use by tackle. The people were allowed to file through and look at the grave, and thousands availed themselves of the opportunity.

Presently the word ran among the thousands upon the hill-sides that the funeral procession was in sight. Far up the road it could be seen wending along its slow and solemn way. Presently it entered the grounds, the dragoons now in advance and the Cabinet Ministers following the hearse in carriages. Slowly it came until the side of the open grave was reached, where, borne by eight stout artillerymen, the casket was placed in the shell and lowered into the tomb.

The scene will hardly ever be forgotten by those who witnessed it,—the mourners at the foot of the grave, the colleagues of the dead Premier ranged by its side, the thousands upon thousands standing with bared heads as the last rites were performed. Venerable Archdeacon Jones, in his flowing white robes and scarlet cape, and Rev. Mr. Bogert, also in full canonicals, assisted by half a dozen minor clergy, performed the ceremony. It was very simple, the short yet beautiful and impressive burial service of the Anglican church, but when as the minister uttered, "Earth to earth, dust to dust, ashes to ashes," the earth clods struck the coffin with hollow sounds, there were few dry eyes in all that great assemblage, and those present manifested the feelings which were those of the nation. It was soon over, the mourners and Cabinet Ministers took a last lingering look into the grave, the tackle was loosened, the great stone lids of the sarcophagus fell into their beds. Molten lead was poured into the crevices, a layer of cement covered all, and the remains of the man the people had so loved and honoured were left in the resting-place where, when in life, he had desired they should be laid.

CHAPTER XXIX.

LAST APPEAL TO THE ELECTORS.

THE last address of Sir John Macdonald to the electors of Canada was issued at the opening of the campaign of 1891, and dated 7th of February in that year. The following is the text of the address:—

To the Electors of Canada :

GENTLEMEN,—The momentous questions now engaging public attention having, in the opinion of the Ministry, reached that stage when it is desirable that an opportunity should be given to the people of expressing at the polls their views thereon, the Governor-General has been advised to terminate the existence of the present House of Commons and to issue writs summoning a new Parliament. This advice His Excellency has seen fit to approve, and you, therefore, will be called upon within a short time to elect members to represent you in the great council of the nation. I shall be a candidate for the representation of my old constituency, the city of Kingston.

In soliciting at your hands a renewal of the confidence which I have enjoyed as a Minister of the Crown for thirty years, it is, I think, convenient that I should take advantage of the occasion to define the attitude of the Government in which I am First Minister towards the leading political issues of the day.

As in 1878, in 1882, and again in 1887, so in 1891, do questions relating to the trade and commerce of the country occupy a foremost place in the public mind. Our policy in respect thereto is to-day what it has been for the past thirteen years, and is directed by a firm determination to foster and develop the varied resources of the Dominion by every means in our power consistent with Canada's position as an integral portion of the British Empire. To that end we have laboured in the past, and we propose to continue in the work to which we have applied ourselves, of building up on this continent, under the flag of England, a great and powerful nation.

When, in 1878, we were called upon to administer the affairs of the Dominion, Canada occupied a position in the eyes of the world very different from that which she enjoys to-day. At that time a profound depression hung like a pall over the whole country, from the Atlantic ocean to the western limits of the Province of Ontario, beyond which to the Rocky Mountains stretched a vast and almost unknown wilderness. Trade was depressed, manufactures languished, and exposed to ruinous competition, Canadians were fast sinking into the position of being mere hewers of wood and drawers of water for the great nation dwelling to the south of us.

We determined to change this unhappy state of things. We felt that Canada, with its agricultural resources, rich in its fisheries, timber and mineral wealth, was worthy of a nobler position than that of being a slaughter market for the United States. We said to the Americans: "We are perfectly willing to trade with you on equal terms. We are desirous of having a fair reciprocity treaty, but we will not consent to open our markets to you while yours remain closed to us." So we inaugurated the National Policy. You all know what followed. Almost, as if by magic, the whole face of the country underwent a change. Stagnation and apathy and gloom—ay, and want and misery, too—gave place to activity and enterprise and prosperity. The miners of Nova Scotia took courage; the manufacturing industries in our great centres revived and multiplied; the farmer found a market for his produce, the artisan and labourer employment at good wages, and all Canada rejoiced under the quickening impulse of a new-found life. The age of deficits was past, and an overflowing treasury gave to the Government the means of carrying forward those great works necessary to the realization of our purpose to make this country a homogeneous whole.

To that end we undertook that stupendous work, the Canadian Pacific Railway, undeterred by the pessimistic views of our opponents; nay, in spite of their strenuous and even malignant opposition, we pushed forward that great enterprise through the wilds north of Lake Superior, across the western prairies, over the Rocky Mountains, to the shore of the Pacific, with such inflexible resolution that in seven years after the assumption of office by the present Administration the dream of our public men was an accomplished fact, and I myself experienced the proud satisfaction of looking back from the steps of my car upon the Rocky Mountains fringing the eastern sky.

The Canadian Pacific Railway now extends from ocean to ocean, opening up and developing the country at a marvellous rate and forming an imperial highway to the east, over which the trade of the Indies is destined to reach the markets of Europe. We have subsidized steamship lines on both oceans—to Europe, China, Japan, Australia and the West Indies. We have spent millions on the extension and improvement of our canal system. We have, by liberal grants of subsidies, promoted the building of railways, now become an absolute necessity, until the whole country is covered as with a network; and we have done all this with such prudence and caution that our credit in the money markets of the world is higher to-day than it has ever been, and the rate of interest on our debt, which is the true measure of the public burdens, is less than it was when we took office in 1878.

During all this time what has been the attitude of the Reform party? Vacillating in their policy, and inconstancy itself. As regards their leaders, they have at least been consistent in this particular, that they have uniformly opposed every measure which had for its object the development of our common country. The National Policy was a failure before it had been tried. Under it we could not possibly raise a revenue sufficient for the public requirements. Time exposed that fallacy. Then, we were to pay more for the home manufactured article than we used to when we imported everything from abroad. We were to be the prey of rings and monopolies, and the manufacturers were to extort their prices. When these fears had been proved unfounded, we were assured that over-competition would inevitably prove the ruin of the manufacturing industries, and thus bring about a state of affairs worse than that which the National Policy had been designed to meet. It was the same with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The whole project, according to our opponents, was a chimera. The engineering difficulties were insuperable; the road, even if constructed, would never pay. Well, gentlemen, the project was feasible, the engineering difficulties were overcome, and the road does pay.

Disappointed by the failure of all their predictions, and convinced that nothing is to be gained by further opposition on the old lines, the Reform party has taken a new departure and has announced its policy to be Unrestricted Reciprocity; that is (as defined by its author, Mr. Wiman, in the North American Review a few days ago), free trade with the United States and a common tariff with the United States against the rest of the world.

The adoption of this policy would involve, among other grave evils, discrimination against the mother country. This fact is admitted by no less a personage than Sir Richard Cartwright, who, in his speech at Pembroke on October 21, 1890, is reported to have said: "Some men, whose opinions I respect, entertain objections to this (Unrestricted Reciprocity) proposition. They argue, and argue with force, that it will be necessary for us, if we enter into such an arrangement, to admit the goods of the United States on more favourable terms than those of the mother country. Nor do I deny that that is an objection, and not a light one."

It would, in my opinion, inevitably result in the annexation of this Dominion to the United States. The advocates of Unrestricted Reciprocity on this side of the line deny that it would have such an effect, though its friends in the United States urge as the chief reason for its adoption that Unrestricted Reciprocity would be the first step in the direction of political union.

There is, however, one obvious consequence of this scheme which nobody has the hardihood to dispute, and that is that Unrestricted Reciprocity would necessitate the imposition of direct taxation, amounting to not less than fourteen millions of dollars annually upon the people of this country. This fact is clearly set forth in a remarkable letter addressed a few days ago by Mr. E. W. Thomson—A Radical and Free Trader—to the Toronto Globe, on the staff of which paper he was lately an editorial writer, which, notwithstanding the Globe, with characteristic unfairness, refused to publish, but which, nevertheless, reached the public through another source. Mr. Thomson points out with great clearness that the loss of customs revenue levied upon articles now entering this country from the United States, in the event of the adoption of the policy of Unrestricted Reciprocity, would amount to not less than seven millions of dollars annually. Moreover, this by no means represents the total loss to the revenue which the adoption of such a policy would entail. If American manufacturers now compete favourably with British goods, despite an equal duty, what do you suppose would happen if the duty were removed from the American and retained or, as is very probable, increased on the British article? Would not the inevitable result be a displacement of the duty-paying goods of the mother country by those of the United States? and this would mean an additional loss to the revenue of many millions more.

Electors of Canada, I appeal to you to consider well the full meaning of this proposition. You—I speak now more particularly to the people of this Province of Ontario—are already taxed directly for school purposes, for township purposes, for county purposes, while to the Provincial Government there is expressly given by the constitution the right to impose direct taxation. This latter evil you have so far escaped, but as the material resources of the province diminish, as they are now diminishing, the Local Government will be driven to supplement its revenue derived from fixed sources by a direct tax. And is not this enough, think you, without your being called on by a Dominion tax-gatherer with a yearly demand for $15 a family to meet the obligations of the Central Government? Gentlemen, this is what Unrestricted Reciprocity involves. Do you like the prospect? This is what we are opposing, and what we ask you to condemn by your votes.

Under our present system a man may largely determine the amount of his contributions to the Dominion exchequer. The amount of his tax is always in direct proportion to his means. If he is rich and can afford to drink champagne, he has to pay a tax of $1.50 for every bottle he buys. If he be a poor man, he contents himself with a cup of tea, on which there is no duty, and so on all through the list. If he is able to afford all manner of luxuries he pays a large sum into the coffers of the Government. If he is a man of moderate means and able to enjoy an occasional luxury, he pays accordingly. If he is a poor man his contributions to the treasury are reduced to a minimum. With direct taxation, no matter what may be the pecuniary position of the taxpayer—times may be hard ; crops may have failed ; sickness or other calamity may have fallen on the family, still the inexorable tax-collector comes and exacts his tribute. Does not ours seem to be the more equitable plan ? It is the one under which we have lived and thrived, and to which the Government I lead proposes to adhere.

I have pointed out to you a few of the material objections to this scheme of Unrestricted Reciprocity, to which Mr. Laurier and Sir Richard Cartwright have committed the Liberal party, but they are not the only objections, nor in my opinion are they the most vital. For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting ægis of the British crown. The gallant race who first bore to our shores the blessings of civilization passed, by an easy transition, from French to English rule, and now form one of the most law-abiding portions of the community. These pioneers were speedily recruited by the advent of a loyal band of British subjects, who gave up everything that men most prize, and were content to begin life anew in the wilderness, rather than forego allegiance to their sovereign. To the descendants of these men and of the multitude of Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen who emigrated to Canada, that they might build up new homes without ceasing to be British subjects, to you Canadians, I appeal, and I ask you what have you to gain by surrendering that which your fathers held most dear ? Under the broad folds of the Union Jack we enjoy the most ample liberty to govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow from association with the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. Not only are we free to manage our domestic concerns, but, practically, we possess the privilege of making our own treaties with foreign countries, and in our relations with the outside world we enjoy the prestige inspired by a consciousness of the fact that behind us towers the majesty of England.

The great question which you will shortly be called upon to determine resolves itself into this, shall we endanger our possession of the great heritage bequeathed to us by our fathers, and submit ourselves to direct taxation for the privilege of having our tariff fixed at Washington, with a prospect of ultimately becoming a portion of the American Union ?

I commend these issues to your determination, and to the judgment of the whole people of Canada, with an unclouded confidence that you will proclaim to the world your resolve to show yourselves not unworthy of the proud distinction you enjoy—of being numbered among the most dutiful and loyal subjects of our beloved Queen. As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born—a British subject I will die.

With my utmost, with my latest breath, will I oppose the "veiled treason" which attempts, by sordid means and mercenary proffers, to lure our people from their allegiance. During my long public service of nearly half a century I have been true to my country and its best interests, and I appeal with equal confidence to the men who have trusted me in the past, and to the young hope of the country, with whom rest its destinies for the future, to give me their united and strenuous aid in this my last effort for the unity of the Empire and the preservation of our commercial and political freedom.

I remain, gentlemen,

Your faithful servant,

JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Ottawa, 7th February, 1891.

CHAPTER XXX.

SIR JOHN'S LAST APPEARANCE IN THE HOUSE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD appeared in the House of Commons, for the last time, on the evening of Friday, the 22nd May, just one week before he received the fatal stroke and two weeks and one day before he finally succumbed to the assaults of the angel of death. It had been noted some time before that there was a partial paralysis of the organs of speech, but so slight that in a man less alert in all his faculties it would have been counted a trick of utterance. He seemed petulant at times, also; a thing to cause comment in a man so genial and so kindly as he. But except for these things he had lost none of his accustomed mood or manner. He had the same jaunty, confident air; he seemed as ready as ever to meet his opponents and to take part in public business. It was not his custom to take the position of one carrying on the debate. He rarely made what might be called a speech, reserving himself for special occasions; and in the current ordinary debates, while he watched and listened keenly, he usually refrained from more than an interjectory remark, often of a humorous character. Where a matter was up for discussion relating to his own department, or to some matter concerning which he was specially informed, he bore the principal part in the debate; but his grasp of each question and his tact in conveying information—or withholding it as he often did—were such that these discussions usually were not prolonged.

On the last day of his appearance in his place there were several matters came up in which he deemed it well to intervene in the debate. Of these the two principal questions were raised by Opposition attacks upon men for whom the Premier was determined to demand fair play—Mr. Perley, Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department, and Sir Charles Tupper. There were other matters also upon which he spoke, and altogether he took a more active and sustained part in the debate than was his custom. Mr. Perley suffered attack incidentally in the McGreevy scandal, as it was claimed that the wrongful act alleged to have been committed could not have been committed except through his culpable neglect of duty. The House was in Committee of Supply, and that item in the estimates was reached covering the salaries of officers of the Public Works Department. Sir Richard Cartwright asked whether Mr. Perley had been suspended or not, and Mr. McMullen opposed the vote so far as it was made to cover Mr. Perley's salary. Mixed up with this was the criticism of another salary, because the recipient of it was said to have taken an active part in the general election. The following is from Hansard immediately following Mr. McMullen's speech:—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to the statement by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the subject would be brought up as to the extent to which it is legitimate for civil servants to interfere in political contests, I have nothing to say just now. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says that it is very discourteous for us to move this vote for the salary of the Chief Engineer of Public Works from the 1st July next until the 1st July, 1892. The reason why the vote was postponed the other night was that the House was exceedingly thin, and by a sort of arrangement across the floor we agreed that the Committee should rise and report progress and that the question on this vote should remain as it was. Now, however, it comes up in the ordinary way. As I have already taken occasion to say, this is not a question of Mr. Perley personally at all; it is a question of whether Parliament will provide a salary for the Chief Engineer of Public Works. That Department must have such an officer, and that salary is to be given to the officer who happens to be the Chief Engineer on the 1st July next. It is to be understood that Mr. Perley's conduct is to be under review this session by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I hope that long before the 1st of July next, the truth or falsehood of the statements concerning Mr. Perley will be investigated and decided upon by the Committee in the first place, and by the House in the second place. If any improprieties are proven against Mr. Perley, the House will deal with that, and another Chief Engineer will be appointed ; but there must be a Chief Engineer, and this is not a vote for Mr. Perley, but for whoever happens to be Chief Engineer at the time. Now, as to the question of suspension, I at once say that I will never agree to suspend a respectable man who hitherto has had a good character, who still holds a responsible position, and who has been trusted for years, because charges are brought against him and not yet proven. I would not keep my place for a moment if that were done, and if such a practice is introduced, it must be introduced by a Government of which I am not a member. I will stick to the English practice, that every man should be considered innocent until he is proven guilty.

MR. MILLS (Bothwell). I am rather surprised at the last proposition laid down by the Prime Minister. Certainly, the appropriation we are now asked to vote is an appropriation to be paid after the 1st July.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. To be earned after the 1st July.

MR. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, "earned" after the 1st July, and it may be earned by someone else than Mr. Perley. There is no doubt that no one is disputing that proposition, but the proposition in which the House is interested is to know what action the Government have taken with regard to a person who if he remains in office will earn this salary of Chief Engineer. The First Minister has just stated that until the truth of this charge is established he will not suspend Mr. Perley, but supposing Mr. Perley were charged with murder, would the hon. gentleman apply that rule : how would it be in that case ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. If he were charged with murder he would be charged before a magistrate and there would be sworn evidence against him, and he would be put upon his trial and he could not perform his duties.

MR. MILLS (Bothwell). But he might be bailed out, and I suppose that if he should be bailed the hon. gentleman would still continue him in office. I do not understand the English rule to be as the hon. gentleman has laid down. What makes the matter important in this particular is that Mr. Perley is charged with certain acts which affect him in his character as Chief Engineer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not seen such charges.

MR. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, I understand such charges have been made.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman does not know the charges, and yet he asks for a suspension. He does not know what the charges are, or whether there are any charges at all.

MR. MILLS (Bothwell.) The charges are before the House, and it is pretty clear the First Minister has not read them. Now, what is the English practice. I will take the case of Lord Melville. In 1805, Lord

Melville, who was then First Lord of the Admiralty, was impeached by the House of Commons for certain irregularities committed while holding the office of Treasurer of the Navy. After a criminatory vote had been carried by the House, Lord Melville resigned his position as a Minister of the Crown, although his trial had not yet taken place. The rule that a man is to be considered innocent until guilt is established did not prevent his resignation, and it was deemed expedient to erase his name from the list of Privy Councillors, although he was afterwards acquitted of the charge preferred against him. That is the English rule.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There was first the criminatory vote.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was just such a vote as was given here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was just such a vote as might follow condemnation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and Lord Melville did not resign until then.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was a vote which put Lord Melville, better known as Sir Henry Dundas, on his trial. We have certain charges made against persons here, and the question has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the enquiry of the Committee is exactly such an enquiry as takes place upon an impeachment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh!

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says "Oh!" but I say that is the case. It is for the purpose of ascertaining whether the party is guilty or innocent of the charge. It is a preliminary trial, for the Committee on Privileges and Elections have no power to punish. They report to this House, they perform the particular functions that are performed by the House of Lords in the case of impeachment, but the fact that they have not power to give an effective judgment with a view to punishment does not at all alter the case in this particular. I stated to the House the other day, and I stated, I think, with perfect fairness, that when these charges were made the persons who are to prepare the necessary papers with a view to bring them before the Committee, should not be the persons who stand charged. It is a well settled rule of law that a man is not to be a judge in his own case, and when you place in the hands of the Chief Engineer any part of the collection and arrangement and preparation of the papers which an hon. member of this House said were necessary for the purpose of establishing the case against him, you are departing from that rule, for you are making him to some extent a prosecutor against himself. It does seem to me that the last proposition laid down by the First Minister is indefensible, and entirely at variance with the principles of our law and with the rule that is followed in the United Kingdom.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is not observing his usual accuracy, or rather that his memory has failed him when he referred to the case of Lord Melville and his impeachment. That case and the one under discussion are not analogous at all ; on the contrary, if the hon. gentleman will look back at the history of that case he will find that when Lord Melville was First Lord of the Admiralty there were charges brought against Sir James Trotter, a subordinate officer of the Admiralty, and an attempt made to connect Lord Melville with them, somewhat, perhaps, under circumstances similar to this case. Lord Melville, upon these charges being brought against him, did not resign, and Mr. Pitt did not ask him to resign, and he remained in office more than a year, perhaps for two years, while the evidence was taken inculcating him, as the majority on the committee believed, as being connected with, or conniving at, or submitting to the impropriety of Sir James Trotter. During all the time of that investigation, which is similar to the investigation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, Lord Melville remained First Lord of the Admiralty. It was not until the committee reported, censuring Lord Melville and connecting him with the improprieties committed by Sir James Trotter to such an extent that the House of Commons took it, as a condemnation and impeached him of high crimes and misdemeanours, that he resigned. In addition to that, Lord Melville was a political officer as the hon. gentleman knows, and ought to command the implicit confidence of Parliament, and he could not with propriety retain his office. I remember another case, that of Lord Henry Lennox, who was Chief Commissioner of Works. When he was charged he rose in his place voluntarily and he said that he desired to resign and to fight his battle alone. He denied the charges and he said he wished to fight his battle independent of Parliament, and not to cloak himself with any supposed influence he might have as being a member of the Government, and he did not wish that anything connected with the charges against him should in any way, directly or indirectly, affect the Government, or that they might be supposed to be conniving with him, or supporting him against the charges. However, the case of Lord Melville is precisely a case in support of my argument and contention.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be, but I think that every member of this House who will look at this matter with reasonable impartiality, will feel that it is an unfortunate thing that a gentleman who is charged with very great crimes and misdemeanours should be the person whose official duty it is to submit these documents for the investigation of the committee. I state—and this as my own individual opinion—that I believe that the hon. Minister of Public Works would have better consulted his own dignity, would have better consulted the dignity of the Parliament of Canada, and the interest of the Government, if he had for the time being changed office with some of his colleagues. That, however, I am not disposed to insist on further than to state that I believe he would have done well to have done so. But the hon First Minister, if I understood him rightly just now, stated that no charges had been preferred against Mr. Perley. Well, I find the hon. gentleman who brought this matter forward, among other things states :

“That the said Thomas McGreevy used his influence as a member of this House with the Department of Public Works, and in particular with Henry F. Perley, Esq., to induce him to report to the Quebec Harbour Commission in favor of the payment of said sum of 35 cents per cubic yard.

“That the correspondence on this subject between Henry F. Perley and Larkin, Connolly & Co., before the Quebec Harbour Commissioners were consulted, took place at the suggestion of the said Thomas McGreevy, and was conducted with his knowledge and participation in such a manner as to conceal from the eyes of Parliament and of the public the corrupt character of the contract, in connection with which he had received $27,000.”

I think these are very strong charges against Mr. Perley.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Against Mr. McGreevy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They implicate Mr. Perley very grievously.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An inference may be drawn from these statements affecting Mr. Perley, but they contain no direct charge against him. They charged that Mr. McGreevy used his influence with Mr. Perley, but it is not said that Mr. Perley yielded to the seductions of Mr. McGreevy.

The debate was continued by Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Foster, and Mr. McNeil, and then Sir Richard spoke again, claiming that it was wrong to allow Mr. Perley to retain his office, because it would be part of his official duty to prepare the documents for reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, before which the case involving Mr. Perley's own honour was to be tried. Sir John (and these were his last words on this subject) answered as follows :—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The hon. gentleman makes a mistake in supposing that Mr. Perley has anything to do with the preparation or custody of the documents. All the papers are in the hands of the deputy head, Mr. Gobeil, and Mr. Perley can only have access to them through the intervention of Mr. Gobeil.

The debate on the subject soon afterwards dropped, and the item was carried. The next item discussed was a vote of a similar character, for the salaries of officers in the Department of Railways and Canals. Mr. Foster explained, among other things, that there was a decrease in the estimated salary of the deputy of this department of $1,400, leading Sir Richard Cartwright to ask if the Deputy Minister was to be dispensed with, leaving the duties to Mr. Schrieber, chief engineer of railways. The debate proceeded.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Trudeau has been for many years the Deputy head, Mr. Schrieber, the Chief Engineer of Railways, and the lamented Mr. Page, Chief Engineer of Canals. Mr. Trudeau being an engineer, and especially a hydraulic engineer, as well as Mr. Page, he and Mr. Page acted together for years in connection with the construction of canals and the improvement of the St. Lawrence and other waterways, so that when Mr. Page suddenly died it was thought better that Mr. Trudeau, while still retaining office as Deputy head, should be Mr. Page's successor as Chief Engineer of Canals to carry out the plans which had been settled pretty much by them in concert. Mr. Trudeau is now the Deputy head of the Department of Railways and Canals, and also the Chief Engineer of Canals, and will continue to be so until it is found that the work is too much for him, and some engineer is trained to take the place of Mr. Page. In the meantime, the salary of the Deputy head is saved.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it as Deputy of Chief Engineer that Mr. Trudeau is paid?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is the Deputy head and Chief Engineer, but draws only the salary of Chief Engineer, which is $6,000. He draws the larger and drops the smaller salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no doubt Mr. Trudeau is a good officer, but I rather suspect that the hon. gentleman, if he finds it necessary to replace the Chief Engineer, will find that he has landed himself in a dilemma; for, unless Mr. Trudeau is built on entirely different principles from most men, it would be very disagreeable for him, after enjoying a salary of $6,000, to fall back upon one of $4,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He will not do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not if he can help it, I am quite sure, but the difficulty is this, that if Mr. Trudeau is to continue as Deputy head, and a Chief Engineer be afterwards appointed, you will have the anomaly that you will have one Deputy head drawing $6,000, and a great many others drawing $3,200, and you will find a strike for higher wages on their part.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see any fear of that. Mr. Trudeau is now receiving $6,000, and as long as he remains in the service he will continue to receive that salary. It is rather an anomaly that the Deputy head, the permanent head of the Department, should receive less salary than the two engineers. Mr. Trudeau is an experienced engineer himself, and the only consequence will be that if it is found he requires assistance, he will still be Deputy head and Chief Engineer, and will get an assistant who will be quite satisfied to take the $4,000 and wait for an increase, as Mr. Trudeau, like his political head at this moment, is not a young man, and we may both retire together.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that in the year before last we only spent $44,000, and this year we are asked for $56,000. Now that we have completed a great many of our public works, we ought to be able to make a considerable reduction in the expenditure of the staff required in this Department. Certainly the same amount of work that was going on a few years ago is not now being discharged by the Department of Railways and Canals. A great many railways are now built which formerly necessitated the employment of a large staff, and, though there is some reduction, I think there should be a larger reduction in this expense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In regard to railways, there will be, and there ought to be, ere long a reduction in the engineering staff, because there is no new railway work going on except the Extension Railway and the railway running through Cape Breton. As to canals, however, there is an increased amount of work. The Williamsburg Canal and the Cornwall Canal are now worked up to high pressure in order to have our great waterway finished as soon as possible, and we are entering upon the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, so that there will be no reduction for some years to come in that branch.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not refer to any increased expenses on the Trent Valley Canal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That depends upon the support we get from both sides of the House, including my hon. friend.

Mr. BARRON. The First Minister telegraphed that a grant was to be made this year to complete the Trent Valley Canal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman's memory is not quite correct.

Mr. BARRON. I have seen the telegram, and it says that the Trent Valley Commissioners have reported in favour of the completion of that canal, and that Parliament will be asked this session for a vote for that purpose. So I suppose there will be a considerable sum for that work in the Supplementary Estimates. I would call the attention of the Minister to the fact that the railway bridge at Fenelon Falls, to which reference has so often been made, is still there, preventing barges of any size from going down.

Mr. FOSTER. This does not come under this item, which refers only to the officers in the inside service.

Mr. BARRON. I only desire to call the attention of the First Minister to this matter now, so that he might see that it is attended to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have been called upon for many years without effect, and I am afraid that, unless the Government takes decided action, matters will remain as they are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps, under present circumstances, more decided action may be taken. I may point out that my hon. friend has not been altogether forgotten. The completion of the Trent Valley Canal is provided for by a vote of $76,000 in the current year, and according to the Estimates before us, we have spent no less than $2,000, and a re-vote of $74,000 will be asked, which I hope will satisfy my hon. friend.

When the House rose for recess at six o'clock, the item of salaries in the office of the High Commissioner in London was under discussion. On resuming in the evening it became evident that the Opposition planned a direct and vigorous attack upon the High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper. Dr. Landerkin, Mr. McMullen and others spoke, and Sir John listened but said nothing. He seemed as bright as ever and showed no signs of the calamity which was so soon to come upon him. At length Mr. Paterson of Brant spoke. To no man on the Opposition side was Sir John wont to listen with greater attention than he usually did to Mr. Paterson. The member for South Brant read an extract from Sir Charles Tupper's Kingston speech stating that he was there at Sir John's request to convey a message to his friends in Kingston. Mr. Paterson asked if it was true that he had sent Sir Charles Tupper there, adding "If the First Minister will favour us with a reply then perhaps we might be able to follow it up with inquiries in other directions." According to Hansard the debate then proceeded.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I cannot resist the reductive tones of my hon. friend and I may answer him: Sir Charles Tupper did go there at my request and he made the speech at my instance, and I fancy that his speech must have had a considerable influence, because in the previous election I was elected by a majority of seventeen, and after Sir Charles Tupper made this speech I was elected by a majority that only wanted seventeen of 500. You see I was pretty wise in my generation in asking Sir Charles to go there and make a speech for me.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You would be wise if you stopped him at that point.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will go a little further, and I will say that Sir Charles Tupper came out from England to give us the advantage of his skill and influence and eloquence, at my special request.

Subsequently Mr. Paterson went on to speak of the meeting at Windsor addressed by Sir Charles, and continued:—"But the result was that the gentleman he supported, and who was, I think, the chairman of the Central Committee of the great Liberal-Conservative organization of the whole Province of Ontario, was defeated and my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. McGregor) was returned by 600 or 700 majority. Now the First Minister might tell us whether he lost his shrewdness in taking Sir Charles beyond Kingston, or whether Sir Charles lost his eloquence."

"I will tell you what he did," said Sir John, while his supporters laughed, "He lost his voice."

The attack was continued on an item covering the contingencies for the High Commissioner's office. The following is a part of that debate as shown by the official report:—

MR. PATERSON (Brant). With reference to these contingencies, I wish to ask for information to which I think we are entitled. When the High Commissioner was taking his tour through Canada, it was stated in the press that he travelled by special train. I would like to know whether that was the case, and if so, what was the cost of that train and out of what fund it was defrayed?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not aware that any of the High Commissioner's expenses were paid out of the public service, but I will inquire.

MR. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose his trips from England to this country and back again find a place in the expenses?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. That may be, but I cannot say.

MR. McMULLEN. We have a right to know whether he came out on the special invitation of the First Minister and for what particular purpose. Did he come out for the purpose of attending to elections or other matters of an official character?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have already stated what I asked him to come out for.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The right hon. gentleman stated candidly that he came out to attend the elections. The First Minister has been, however, altogether too modest. I, as a citizen of Kingston, beg to state that it was to the First Minister's own special and earnest care of his constituents, he was indebted for his increased majority. The First Minister had been a good nursing father or mother, whichever he prefers to be called, to the citizens of Kingston for the last three or four years. Such has been his care that a short time ago, when I had to go down to that constituency on private business of my own, the first thing I heard was that the hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to prevent the people from suffering from distress and destitution, caused no less, I think, than one hundred and twenty cars to be built, about the 5th or 10th of February last, in certain car works in that city. About the same time likewise, the hon. gentleman, in his disinterested regard for the welfare of my fellow citizens, was solicitous in procuring some important railway subsidies for projected railways in the neighbourhood of that city. Well, they have as good a right to it—no more and no less—than a good many other roads the hon. gentleman has subsidized.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You did not do much for them.

Those were the last words of the great Premier in the House of Commons. He remained for a short time, while other items were discussed, and left half an hour or so before the adjournment, bidding his colleagues a pleasant, and, as it proved, a last good night.

CHAPTER XXXI.

HIS FELLOW COMMONERS' TRIBUTE.

THOUGH expected for more than a week, the news of Sir John A. Macdonald's death came upon the country with a shock, but no where was it more severely felt than among his fellow members of the House of Commons. Some of these men had given the best years of their lives to the support of the "Old Man" and the policy for Canada that he held to be the sound one, while others had as strenuously opposed him in the bitter fight of contending parties. But in the presence of death there was a common feeling of regard for the man and his work, and a deep sense of loss which caused political boundary lines for the time to disappear. When the House assembled on Monday, the 8th of June, the chamber was draped in emblems of mourning, while the chief place on the treasury benches which Sir John had filled so long, from which his sallies of wit or his strong appeals to his followers and the country had been delivered, was marked by the insignia of death. There was a large attendance of members who listened, many of them with tears, to the tributes paid to the departed leader. The following is the newspaper report of the remarks of the Speaker, the oldest Privy Councillor and the leader of the Opposition:—

OTTAWA, June 8.

The Speaker took the chair at three o'clock.

DEATH OF SIR JOHN MACDONALD.

MR. SPEAKER said:—I desire to inform the House that in view of the fact that the right hon. the leader of the House died so late on Saturday night it was impossible to communicate with hon. members earlier than the present. I thought it was only a fitting tribute to a gentleman who had occupied so prominent a position both in Parliament and in the councils of the country for so long a time that we should exhibit some sign of mourning in this House to-day, and I took the responsibility of ordering that the symbols of mourning which are shown here to-day should be put up this morning, and I venture to express the hope that hon. members on both sides, irrespective altogether of politics, will sustain me in the action I have taken.

HON. MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

SIR HECTOR LANGEVIN.—Mr. Speaker, having to announce to the House the sad event that has been known for two days now, I was afraid I could not trust to my memory, and I therefore thought it desirable to place in writing what I wished to say. Accordingly, I will now read the observations which I desire to offer. Mr. Speaker.—As the oldest Privy Councillor, it falls to my lot to announce to the House that our dear old chief, the First Minister of Canada, is no more. After a painful illness of two weeks death put an end to his earthly career on Saturday last. To tell you, Mr. Speaker, my feelings under the circumstances is more than I can do. I feel that by the death of Sir John Macdonald Canada has lost its greatest statesman—a great patriot, a man of whom any country in the world would be justly proud. Her Majesty, our gracious Queen, never had a more devoted and loyal subject than the Grand Old Man whose loss we all deplore and regret from the bottom of our hearts. For nearly fifty years he has directed the public affairs of this country. He was among the fathers of Confederation the most prominent and distinguished. He put his whole soul in that great undertaking, knowing full well that the confederation of all the British North American provinces would give to our people a country and institutions to be proud of, and to the Empire not only a right arm, but a great and safe highway to her Indian and other possessions. He told me more than once how grateful he was to the people of Canada to have allowed him to have consolidated the great work. The fact is his love for Canada was equal to that he had for his own Mother Country. Mr. Speaker, when the historians of Canada write the history of the last fifty years they will have to write the life of Sir John Macdonald, and in writing his life they may not agree with all his public acts, but they cannot fail to say that he was a great man, a most distinguished statesman, and that his whole life was spent in the service of his country, dying in the midst of his official duties, not having had a day's rest before he passed to a better world. I need not express, Mr. Speaker, my own personal feelings. Having spent half of my life with him as his follower and as his friend, his departure is the same as if I lost half of my existence. I remember how devoted he was, not only to the old province of Canada, but how chivalrous he showed himself to the Province of Quebec, and specially to my French-Canadian countrymen.

He had only a word to say, and instead of being at the head of a small band of seventeen Upper Canada members he would have had all the representatives of his province behind him, but, as he told me several times, he preferred to be just to his French compatriots and allies and the result was that when Confederation came the Province of Quebec had confidence in him, and on his deathbed our great chief could see that his just policy has secured peace and happiness to all. Mr. Speaker, I would have wished to continue to speak of our dear departed friend, and spoken to you about his goodness of heart, the witness of which I have been so often, but I feel that I must stop. My heart is full of tears. I cannot proceed further. I move :—

“That in the opinion of this House the mortal remains of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, G.C.B., should be publicly interred, and that this House will concur in giving to the ceremony a fitting degree of solemnity and importance.”

MR. LAURIER—Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate the motion which the hon. gentleman has just proposed to the House, and we all concur that his silence under the circumstances is far more eloquent than any human language can be. I fully appreciate the intensity of the grief which fills the souls of all those who were the friends and followers of Sir John A. Macdonald at the loss of the great leader whose whole life has been so closely identified with their party—a party upon which he has thrown such brilliancy and lustre. We on this side of the House, who were his opponents, who did not believe in his policy nor in his methods of government, take our full share of their grief, for the loss which they deplore to day is far and away beyond and above the ordinary compass of party strife. It is in every respect a great national loss, for he is no more who was in many respects Canada's most illustrious son, and who was in every sense Canada's foremost citizen and statesman. At the period of life to which Sir John A. Macdonald had arrived, death, whenever it comes, cannot come unexpected. Some few months ago, during the turmoil of the last election, when the country was made aware that on a certain day the physical strength of the veteran Premier had not been equal to his courage, and that his intense labour for the time being had prostrated his singularly wiry frame, everybody with the exception perhaps of his buoyant self was painfully anxious lest, perhaps, the angel of death had touched him with his wings. When a few days ago, in the midst of an angry discussion in this Parliament, the news spread in this House that of a sudden his condition had become alarming, the surging wave of angry discussion was at once hushed, and everyone, friend and foe, realized that this time for certainty the angel of death had appeared and had crossed the threshold of his home. Thus we were not taken by surprise, and although we were not prepared for the sad event, yet it is almost impossible to convince the unwilling mind that it is true that Sir John Macdonald is no more ; that the chair which we now see vacant shall remain forever vacant ; that the face so familiar in this Parliament for the last forty years shall be seen no more, and that the voice so well known shall be heard no more, whether in solemn debate or in pleasant and mirthful tones. In fact the place of Sir John A. Macdonald in this country was so large and so absorbing that it was almost impossible to conceive that the politics of this country—the fate of this country—will continue without him. His loss overwhelms us. For my part I say, with all truth, his loss overwhelms me, and that it also overwhelms this Parliament, as if indeed one of the institutions of the land had given way. Sir John A. Macdonald now belongs to the ages, and it can be said with certainty that the career which has just been closed is one of the most remarkable careers of this century. It would be premature at this time to attempt to divine or anticipate what will be the final judgment of history upon him, but there were in his career and in his life features so prominent and so conspicuous that already they shine with a glory which time cannot alter. These characteristics appear before the House at the present time such as they will appear to the end in the history. I think it can be asserted that for the supreme art of governing men Sir John Macdonald was gifted as few men in any land or in any age were gifted—gifted with the most high of all qualities—qualities which would have shone in any theatre, and which would have shone conspicuously the larger the theatre. The fact that he could congregate together elements the most heterogeneous and blend them into one compact party, and to the end of his life keep them steadily under his hand, is perhaps altogether unprecedented. The fact that during all these years he maintained unimpaired, not only the confidence, but the devotion, the ardent devotion, and affection of his party, is evidence that, beside these higher qualities of statesmanship to which we were the daily witnesses, he was also endowed with that inner, subtle, undefinable characteristic of soul which wins and keeps the hearts of men. As to his statesmanship, it is written in the history of Canada. It may be said, without any exaggeration whatever, that the life of Sir John Macdonald, from the date he entered Parliament, is the history of Canada, for he was connected and associated with all the events, all the facts, all the developments, which brought Canada from the position Canada then occupied—the position of two small provinces, having nothing in common but the common allegiance, and united by a bond of paper, and united by nothing else—to the present state of development which Canada has reached. Although my political views compel me to say that, in my judgment, his actions were not always the best that could have been taken in the interest of Canada, although my conscience compels me to say that of late he has imputed to his opponents motives which I must say in my heart he has misconceived, yet I am only too glad to sink these differences, and to remember only the great services he has performed for his country—to remember that his actions displayed unbounded fertility of resource, a high level of intellectual conception, and, above all, a far reaching vision beyond the event of the day, and, still higher, permeating the whole, a broad patriotism, a devotion to Canada's welfare, Canada's advancement, and Canada's glory. The life of a statesman is always an arduous one, and very often it is an ungrateful one ; more often than otherwise his actions do not mature until he is in his grave. Not so, however, in the case of Sir John Macdonald ; his has been a singularly fortunate one. His reverses were few and of short duration. He was fond of power, and in my judgment, if I may say so, that was the turning point of his history. He was fond of power, and he never made any secret of it. Many times we have heard him avow it on the floor of this Parliament, and his ambition in this respect was gratified as perhaps no other man's ambition ever was. In my judgment even the career of William Pitt can hardly compare with that of Sir John Macdonald in this respect, for although William Pitt, moving in a higher sphere, had to deal with problems greater than ours, yet I doubt if in the management of a party William Pitt had to contend with difficulties equal to those that Sir John Macdonald had to contend with. In his death, too, he seems to have been singularly happy. Twenty years ago I was told by one who at that time was a close personal and political friend of Sir John Macdonald that in the intimacy of his domestic circle he was fond of repeating that his end would be as the end of Lord Chatham—that he would be carried away from the floor of Parliament to die. How true his vision into the future was we now know, for we saw him at the last, with enfeebled health and declining strength, struggling on the floor of Parliament until, the hand of fate upon him, he was carried to his home to die. And thus to die with his armour on was probably his ambition. Sir, death is the supreme law. Although we see it every day in every form, although session after session we have seen it in this Parliament striking right and left without any discrimination as to age or station, yet the ever-recurring spectacle does not in any way remove the bitterness of the sting. Death always carries with it an incredible sense of pain, but the one thing sad in death is that which is involved in the word separation—separation from all we love in life. This is what makes death so poignant when it strikes a man of intellect in middle age. But when death is the natural termination of a full life, in which he who has disappeared has given the full measure of his capacity, has performed everything required from him and more, the sadness of death is not for him who goes, but for those who love him and remain. In this sense I am sure the Canadian people will extend unbounded sympathy to the friends of Sir John Macdonald, to his sorrowing children, and, above all, to the brave and noble woman, his companion in life and chief helpmate. Thus, Mr. Speaker, one after another we see those who have been instrumental in bringing Canada to its present state of development moved from amongst us. To-day we deplore the loss of him whom we all unite in saying was the foremost Canadian of his time, and who filled the largest place in Canadian history. Only last week was buried in the city of Montreal another son of Canada, one who at one time had been a tower of strength to the Liberal party—one who will ever be remembered as one of the noblest, purest, and greatest characters that Canada has ever produced, Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion. Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion had not been in favour of Confederation. Not that he was opposed to the principle, but he believed that the union of these provinces at that day was premature. When, however, Confederation had become a fact, he gave the best of his mind and heart to make it a success. It may, indeed, happen, sir, when the Canadian people see the ranks thus gradually reduced and thinned of those upon whom they have been in the habit of relying for guidance, that a feeling of apprehension will creep into the heart lest, perhaps, the institutions of Canada may be imperilled. Before the grave of him who above all was the Father of Confederation let not grief be barren grief, but let grief be coupled with the resolution—the determination—that the work in which Liberals and Conservatives—in which Brown and Macdonald united—shall not perish, but that though united Canada may be deprived of the services of her greatest men, yet still Canada shall and will live! I agree to the motion.

CHAPTER XXXII.

ANECDOTES AND INCIDENTS.

THE stories told about Sir John A. Macdonald are a literature in themselves. His contact with the people was so close, his characteristics so varied and so strong, and his companionableness so great, that almost every conversation with him and every incident, however trivial, in the whole of his long career, was deemed noteworthy. Besides that it is the experience of every nation that about its great hero gather apocryphal stories of all kinds, every manner of clever thing that ever was done, said or imagined, being attributed to him. Stories are told about "John A." around the Canadian fireside which one hears in the United States about Abe Lincoln, and in England about Fox or Pitt or Beaconsfield. Only he whose knowledge of the literature of anecdotes is complete can separate the true from the false in traditions of the life of Canada's greatest son; but there are many incidents which have the local colouring so well-defined that their authenticity cannot be doubted. Among these are the following stories, which are all more or less characteristic of him who is gone.

David Gibson, merchant, Kingston, remembers Sir John in his younger days quite well. The former was employed in the Gazette office, owned at that time by James McFarlane, a great friend and adviser of the then young statesman. Sir John was frequently in the office, and as Mr. McFarlane saw that his young friend had a bright career before him, he used his efforts and his journal to open it up for him. Sir John was a "hail fellow well met" with the employes, all of whom were pleased to see him enter the office. He passed none unnoticed. Mr. Gibson was a member of St. Andrew's Society with Sir John, and he remembers quite well the occasion when the latter was first elected to the office of piper of the lodge. The brethren in kilts, with Sir John at their head, in Highland costume also, proceeded to his residence on the corner of Princess and Barrie Streets. They were met at the door by his mother, who, when the piper stood before her, descended from the steps, and, snapping her fingers, gave the time for an eight-hand Scotch reel, which was indulged in then and there. Mr. Gibson says that Sir John inherited the genius of his mother. She was tall, energetic, kind and hospitable, and a genuine specimen of a Highland woman. She won the friendship of all at the first meeting, just as her son did.

Mr. Peter Lenea, who attended school with Sir John Macdonald in 1823, is still living, and in his 84th year. John was about 10 years of age, relates the old gentlemen, and did not show any particular sign of brightness of intellect, but even at this early age he was shrewd. Whenever he got into trouble with other boys he was always able to present his case in a favourable light, and invariably escaped punishment. The teacher told him frequently that he would make a better lawyer than a clergyman.

The fact that Sir A. A. Dorion, Chief Justice of Quebec, died a few days before Sir John, recalls an incident which now seems almost prophetic. It is perhaps not generally known that when Hon. Mr. Dorion accepted the portfolio of justice in the Mackenzie Administration, and when going back to his constituents in Napierville, the then leader of the Opposition, Sir John, was opposed to the idea of offering the French leader any opposition. Soon after this, Hon. Mr. Dorion retired from the Cabinet and became Chief Justice of the Province of Quebec. The two statesmen met one day before the Chief Justice left Ottawa, and Sir John, after he had congratulated him with the utmost warmth, said: "Mr. Dorion, we are no longer young, and it may be that neither will last many years. Who knows, my friend, but we may undertake the long journey together?"

Mr. Fred Perry, of Montreal, is one of the veteran politicians of the Dominion. In an interview published, while Sir John was lying at the point of death, Mr. Perry said: "When he came to Montreal first, politics did not count for much, and the fight was race against race, and religion against religion. When Sir John took the new departure, and went in for union and conciliation, we ultras opposed him, but I now feel that he was right and we were wrong, and my regret to-day is that I did not support him. Ours was village politics, but his was to build up a great Dominion. He said to me once at the Windsor hotel: 'Fred, your bark is worse than your bite, and I only wish I had more personal friends like you.' Mr. Perry also related the case of the famous meeting in Dominion Square, when Sir John designated a dozen or more disturbers, with Perry and Jim Stewart at their head, as the Herald brass band. It appears that the noise was made with black bottles, and when the trouble was over the Premier asked Perry to explain to him how he had succeeded in extracting such unearthly sounds from the instruments in question. After his old personal friend and political opponent had let Sir John into the secret the old veteran laughed heartily, and said he must give the patent to the boys in Kingston."

LITTLE & Brown

A follower of Sir John Macdonald in the House of Commons says:—"The first time I met Sir John Macdonald was in the early part of the summer of 1878. He addressed a meeting that night in the amphitheatre in Toronto, and we had one at Seaton Village. After it was over we drove in to the city and went to the U.E. Club, where I was introduced to Sir John. When I went to the House of Commons the first session after that election I met Sir John, and though I only met him once, he quickly recognized me and gave me a most cordial greeting. A very important factor in his successful career was his remarkable faculty of remembering men's faces and names. A few years ago I was talking to a King Street merchant in the post-office corridor of the Commons. Sir John came along, slapped him on the shoulder and said, 'Hello, Cheeseworth, how are things going in Toronto?' to the evident pleasure and surprise of the Torontonion, who marvelled at his prompt recognition."

Mr. Barr (Luke Sharp), the well-known Detroit journalist, at a dinner in Ottawa, told a couple of incidents, showing by contrast the marvellous power of the Premier in recognizing faces, and explaining in part the secret of the "Old Man's" ability to make friends. On one occasion Mr. Barr met in New York a prominent Liberal politician whom he had often met and who he doubted not would at once recognize him. He therefore advanced with extended hand to greet him. But the other had forgotten him entirely. "Young man," he said, "I'm too old and experienced to be taken in by any New York bunco steerer." On the other hand, he had met Sir John Macdonald, but meeting him again some years after, the greeting came prompt and cheery, "How are you Barr, when did you leave Detroit?"

The last night Sir John was in Parliament, the 22nd of May, was a memorable one. He moved about among the members nearly the whole evening, Mr. Hazen, the member for St. John, N.B., was telling Mr. R. S. White, M.P., an amusing story of some election of 1887, and as Sir John was passing along we insisted that he should tell it to him also, which he did. The old chieftain laughed heartily, and sat down and told a couple of excellent campaign stories, and one about the great English free trader Cobden, as related by himself, and which it was said was the only humorous story Cobden ever told. I then congratulated Sir John on his rapid recovery from his earlier illness, and he said 'Yes, I am getting better, but very slowly.'

Asked, after Sir John's death, what he believed to be the elements of the great man's success, Hon. Mackenzie Bowell said: "I consider that the chief element in his success was a thorough knowledge, by long study, of human nature, and an unflinching sense of prudence. He never rushed into a conclusion. While others would be impetuous and desirous of pushing the ideas that first suggested themselves, he, during the long years in which I was associated with him, never took action upon any serious matter until he had taken some time for consideration. It was doubtless from this habit that he gained the soubriquet of 'Old To-morrow.' In questions of doubt it was his invariable practice to court the opinions of every colleague before taking action. Combined with these qualities was a frankness and an unchanging kindliness of disposition with every one with whom he came in contact. This striking feature in his character was often illustrated in the fact that men who came to him with grievances went away quite satisfied that they had fair treatment."

A leading Conservative Member of Parliament from the Maritime Provinces said of Sir John: "He seemed to be able, as if by instinct, to gauge the average of opinions in the House, and this was true in the larger field of the constituencies as well. No mere strength of intellect could have served him for this purpose. As a mother feels the needs and desires of her child, so Sir John felt the needs, desires and aspirations of the Canadian people by his innate sympathy with them. Canadians felt justly that he was one of them, and at one with them. This sympathetic power was shown also in his relations with individuals."

I was present at the great outdoor meeting which he held last autumn near Halifax, and can testify to the impression he made there. For a half hour before the speaking began he forced his way through the thronging thousands, and diffused mirth, geniality and kindly feeling from him as a censer sheds its incense. A negro, the only one in that great crowd, was forcing his way towards Sir John, who immediately advanced to meet him, asked for an introduction, shook his hand and said: "I am glad to see you here. All your people in Ontario support me, and I hope you are equally sensible." The words were nothing, but their manner called out a hearty cheer from those around, and I venture to say that that humble negro will feel that some virtue has departed from Canada when he hears of the great man's death.

Hon. George E. Foster, Minister of Finance, had this to say of Sir John:—His wealth of reminiscence and vivid portrayal he poured out without stint to his colleagues, and rarely indeed did a consultation pass without furnishing one or more rich recollections of by-gone days filled with instruction and valuable precedent. In this regard it is sadly true that we shall never look upon his like again. His memory struck me as wonderfully retentive, and reproduced with great exactness and vividness the impressions it had received from experience, observation or reading, and this, aided by his charming manner of recital and his apt vocabulary, made him a most fascinating and instructive raconteur. He was an omnivorous reader of books, and would often astonish me by allusion to works covering the widest area of biography, history, theology and fiction, the leading features of which he appeared to have thoroughly in hand. Often have I inquired at the library for some new book, under the impression that I should find use for it, only to be informed that the Premier had taken it out.

Sir John's last words in the House were to the Hon. Mr. Bowell. A little after ten on that famous Friday night the Minister of Customs noticed the Premier looking weary; going over to his desk he said: "Sir John, you look tired; it's time young fellows like you were at home and in bed." "I guess, I will go home," the chieftain replied, and after a word with Sir Hector, he said, "good night, Bowell," and walked out, never to return..

One of Sir John's particular friends in politics was the Hon. Thomas White, who, when he died, was Minister of the Interior. The friendship between the Premier and Mr. White was exceedingly close, and there are some strange coincidences in their careers. Mr. White has always been credited with taking the stand which nipped in the bud a movement to have Sir John Macdonald deposed from the leadership of the party in the days when it was in opposition. When in 1888 the Premier rose to make mention of the death of his old friend, he burst into tears and was unable to say a word.

One of the greatest pieces of campaigning done in late years was the tour made by Sir John Macdonald, through Ontario, in the winter of 1886-7, in company with the Hon. Thomas White, the Hon. J. S. D. Thompson and the Hon. George E. Foster. The special car, "Jamaica," provided them not only with transportation but with sleeping accommodation and often with meals, and thus enabled them to cover a great extent of territory in a short time. Two and sometimes three meetings were held every day. In one week 900 miles were traversed, and meetings held in a dozen towns and villages. The comforts of the car were of great value in lessening the fatigue and hardship of travel to the Premier. Sir John left the heavy work of the campaign to his lieutenants, but was careful to gratify the popular wish by putting in an appearance at every meeting and making a brief speech. Several times he referred to his advancing years and to the certainty that he would soon retire from the stage. Some words of his at Welland, though spoken jestingly, and greeted with laughter, have now a significance:—"He was sorry to say—it was an unfortunate thing—that he could not live forever, and that he must make room for others. He had, however, given them a specimen of his 'boys' that evening. Doubtless the people would weep very much at his retirement, but they would have some consolation in knowing that he would leave behind him worthy successors to take his place."

The following from a Napanee correspondent appeared in the Globe:—"At the laying of the corner-stone of the new church at Napanee, about fifteen years ago, the late Rev. Saltern Givens, the first Church of England clergyman at Napanee, was present, and in his address gave some interesting reminiscences of his work when the town was a mere hamlet, sometime in the thirties—I forget the year. He said the services were held in a school house near the village, and it was the custom of several young men to meet one night in the week and practise psalmody, so as to better assist in the Sunday service. 'Among them,' said Mr. Givens, 'was a young man who I am bound to say turned out much more successful as a politician than a singer; I refer to Sir John A. Macdonald.'"

On the last night when Sir John was in the House, the attack upon Sir Charles Tupper for taking part in the General Election was being made by the Liberals, Sir John was as fond of a joke as ever. Mr. Paterson of Brant mentioned that the High Commissioner addressed a meeting at Kingston and the Minister's majority was largely increased. But how was it, he asked, that a like result had not attended his efforts at London and Windsor? Had the First Minister lost his shrewdness or had Sir Charles lost his eloquence? The Premier's ready response was, "I'll tell you what he did, he lost his voice."

The first time Mr. Flanagan, the city clerk of Kingston, saw him was in court pleading at the bar. He went home and told his wife that he had heard a fine young lawyer speak, and that he was an Irishman. He thought his name was Macdonough, but his wife corrected the error and told him who the lawyer was. Sir John is the only man alive who was a member of the Council when Mr. Flanagan was appointed, clerk. The latter remembers the statesman as an alderman, quite well. He was the life of the Council, and frequently held high revelry at the meetings. At one time he came near causing the officials to resign because he advocated their wearing a gorgeous uniform, which he described at length while winking at the mayor. He met the late John Shaw on the street and said:—"Mr. Shaw, what shall I do to become popular?"

"Join our lodge and run for alderman," was the reply.

Inside of a month he was an Orangeman and an alderman. He was the young men's candidate. The election was very close and keen. He was elected and the young men were so pleased that they improvised a platform on the market, and after Sir John and his friends had mounted it the electors carried it on their shoulders and the result was a capsize. Slush was deep on the ground, and as Sir John brushed his clothes he remarked, "Isn't it strange I should have a downfall so soon?"

He was only two years in the Council when the young people brought him out for Parliament against Mr. Monohan, whom he defeated. He did not resign his seat in the Council but served to the end of his term. He was most adept in handling committees, and as a rule the side he took prevailed. On one occasion he suggested that the Council elect the mayor. The suggestion was adopted, and the custom was followed for years. He recommended Ald. Grier to run for mayor, and when the latter was defeated, Sir John said, "If it is ever in my power to make amends I will do so." Years afterward he appointed Mr. Grier registrar of Wentworth at a good salary. Besides having great courage in debate, Mr. Flanagan said Sir John was a brave man otherwise. He remembers when a serious fire occurred on Princess Street, and Sir John turned out with the firemen to fight the flames, which spread so rapidly that the hosemen were unable to get near enough to make the water supply of effective service. Sir John hurriedly nailed a number of boards together and then asked for assistance to plant the shield near the building. Mr. Flanagan approached him and said, "Mr. Macdonald, it is reported that there are several kegs of powder in the cellar and that the building will soon blow up," The reply was, "For goodness sake don't make that known, else we will be left alone, and there is no telling where the fire will stop." Raising the shield he carried it forward and placed it close to the building. From behind it the hosemen did good service, and the explosion which was feared did not occur.

A tale is told of Sir John when he was seriously sick in 1870, and was so reduced that his medical attendant would only give him the soft portion of an oyster and a little claret at a time. Sir John, though by no means a great eater, wanted more, and asked for more. "You must be contented, Sir John," was the reply, "remember, the hopes of Canada are on you." "Well, doctor," said Sir John, "It's a funny thing if the hopes of Canada rest on half an oyster."

THE LAST LETTER WRITTEN BY SIR JOHN.

The Victoria Colonist publishes, on the authority of Hon. Mr. Dewdney and Mr. Joseph Pope, the following, as the last letter written by the late Premier:

"EARNSCLIFFE, OTTAWA,

"May 19, 1891.

"MY DEAR ROBSON,—It has occurred to me that the present would be an opportune season for your Government to discuss with ours the various questions still unsettled between them.

“You, I presume, can get away from Victoria with little or no inconvenience, and you will find us here in Parliamentary session until the 1st of July or later. We will then scatter until October, and at that season you, I suppose, will be wanted at home.

“Besides it will be a pleasant season for your journey—so, give yourself leave of absence, and Dewdney, you, and I can take up and any other unsolved questions that may remain. Herein fail not.

“Yours sincerely,

“JOHN A. MACDONALD.

“The Hon. John Robson, Premier, etc., Victoria, B. C.”

CHAPTER XXXIII.

SIR JOHN AT HOME—LADY MACDONALD.

THE biographer who properly respects the privacy of domestic life must necessarily be under restraint in taking the reader with him across the portals of the home. Any sketch of the character and career of the deceased Premier would, nevertheless, be singularly incomplete which did not touch, however briefly, on Sir John in private life. The genial and lovable qualities that so distinguished the man and endeared him to all classes of the people, found their freest and heartiest expression in the bosom of his family. Within the domestic circle he displayed to the full those charming dispositions and graces which, abroad, make him the idol of the public. "He is a very prince at his own board," was the remark of a distinguished guest at Earnscliffe who had been wont to enjoy the hospitalities of the Premier. "That winning grace of manner which those who do not know him think he wears for political purposes in public life, shines out still more brightly in the domestic and social sphere, that it is really impossible to know Sir John at the fireside or the board and not love him. When not receiving friends at dinner or in some other social way, Sir John used to be found in his library attending to public business, or reading until late at night. He read with great rapidity. The range of his reading was extensive and varied; this may really be said to have formed almost his only recreation. In conversation he was brilliant and entertaining, and as not a few with whom he exchanged hospitalities differed from him in politics, his conversation on public questions was tolerant, airy, and good-natured. Mr. Goldwin Smith, replying on one occasion in The Bystander, to the charge of having learnt some ministerial trick at 'Stadacona Hall' (a former residence of the late Premier), tells us that his impression is 'that there is not much to be learnt at Stadacona Hall beyond the lessons taught by the example of a statesman who knows how to lay politics aside in the social hour, and is large-minded enough to bear with opinions differing from his own.' "

"But the crown," says the writer of the earlier edition of this work, "to Sir John's social success is given by the place his very accomplished and popular wife, Lady Macdonald, fills at the capital. Of the society circle there, she is voted pre-eminently, the queen, where in every project of social enterprise she is the first and the last, and no less the favourite of the elderly and the demure, than of the young folk. To go to Ottawa and mention the name of Lady Macdonald to any of the young people there, is at once to bring forth a pæan in her praise. Everything, they tell you, that is to be 'got up,' Lady Macdonald has a hand in, not indeed that she seeks to take this place or even cares for it; but so kindly is her nature that she is prodigal both of her time and energy to make everything agreeable; while it is a fact that nothing seems to go on so harmoniously or successfully when she is not at its head and front. She seems to be in the social what her husband is in the public sphere. In political questions, too, this gifted lady takes no little interest, and her judgment is said to be scarcely less sound than that of Sir John, who, it is whispered, is in the habit of consulting her when he is about to take some important political step. And while we have no doubt that, like the wives of several distinguished English statesmen, what rumour says of Lady Macdonald in this respect is true, yet it is the social sphere that she most adorns, where she is no less warmly admired by ladies whose husbands are politically opposed to Sir John than by those of his own friends. In domestic life, Lady Macdonald is a model woman, lavishing her tenderness upon an invalid daughter, keeping a household that might well be the envy of any circle; attending to Sir John at late sittings of the House, and, as Mrs. Disraeli used to do, and as Mrs. Gladstone does, wrapping up her husband after he has made a speech, and zealously guarding his health at home or while travelling. And to quote the young people again, who will insist on telling their gratitude, she is ready at five minutes' warning, no matter how fatigued she may be, to have lunch for a tired toboggan or snow-shoe party, or to accompany gatherings of young folks as chaperon. Add this to her genial and kindly manner, her charity to the scores who will press their wants upon a lady in high station and especially when they find her heart tender and her purse open. Altogether Lady Macdonald is a worthy mate for her thrice worthy and distinguished husband."

What is here said of Lady Macdonald, by one writing of her eight or ten years ago, is emphasized by the testimony of those who have knowledge of her since. The feeling towards her, among the large circle of her friends and acquaintances, has been that of ever-deepening affection and regard. To the number of her social friends and admirers have been added, of recent years, no inconsiderable number of literary friends and admirers, for Lady Macdonald has a graceful pen and has made, in English sources, some delightful contributions to the literature of Canadian travel. But it has been in the wifely devotion and tender solicitude of these sad days of the nation's bereavement and her own that Lady Macdonald has pre-eminently touched the hearts and evoked the love and sympathetic interest of the people. Her unwearying tendance through these agonizing hours by her loved husband's couch, has drawn to her the hearts alike of Queen and Commoner.

Here, at the close of this book, written to preserve, however faintly and unworthily, some chronicle of the dead Premier's life and work, may fitly be appended the following tender and patriotic letter. It was penned by Lady Macdonald, to acknowledge the condolence of the political friends and followers of her late husband, CANADA'S PATRIOT STATESMAN:—

To the Chairman of the Ministerialist Committee:

EARNSCLIFFE, Ottawa, June 17th, 1891.

I have received and read with a profound satisfaction the address you forwarded to me from the Conservative members of both Houses of Parliament, conveying in words that are each one a comfort and consolation to me their sense of my loss and their own. Will you do me the favour to say to these gentlemen, my husband's true and devoted friends, with what a swelling heart I dwell on their testimony to the greatness of him, whose useful, kindly, Christian life, it will ever be our high privilege to remember.

I thank these dear friends with tears—not of sorrow, for such a life and such a death are beyond the reach of common sorrow—but with tears of gratitude and affection in acknowledgment of their love for him and faithfulness to him through many years and many battles. Will you tell them from me at some time when all can hear that I, his widow, and broken-hearted in my loneliness and desolation, venture to ask from them a last and lasting tribute to my husband's dear memory.

I ask that that tribute shall be a firm and united support of the policy and principles our great leader lived and died to maintain and carry out. I appeal to them with all the power my words can convey to do now and in the future what they and I know would be my husband's wish and desire could those lips, silent on earth forever, once more speak on this or any other crisis of our country's history. To stand side by side, shoulder to shoulder, regardless of irritation, self-interest or seeming reverse, with no goal but Canada's success; to follow, in short, the splendid example left to us and to carry out with no sign of division or faltering the plans and purposes that lay so near Sir John's heart.

I shall watch, so long as my life lasts, with earnest anxiety, the progress of public affairs as for the last twenty years I have been proud to do, and pray, as I have always prayed, that the Almighty Ruler of all men would of His mercy grant wisdom, foresight and firmness to the policy and counsels of the great Conservative party.

Believe me your sincere friend,

AGNES MACDONALD.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

ENGLISH AND OTHER ESTIMATES OF THE DECEASED PREMIER'S LIFE-WORK.

THE death of Sir John Macdonald has, naturally enough, evoked in England no inconsiderable volume of comment. With remarkable unanimity the great English organs of public opinion have expressed regret that a most useful life has terminated, while they praise the work which has been wrought by that life for Canada and the Empire. Where eulogy has been qualified there is no disposition to ignore the enormous difficulties the late Premier had to contend with. If they withhold praise of his commercial policy, they acknowledge his services in preserving Canada to the Crown. If they cannot laud his political methods, they recognize his great personality, and do justice to the rare qualities of head and heart that distinguished him. In Sir John Macdonald, as a writer has remarked, "Canada has lost a patriot, England a staunch friend, and the world a worthy and distinguished man." From the mass of English journalistic comment we make the following extracts:—

THE TIMES.

"To-day the Canadian people mourns the veteran statesman who has for the last thirteen years presided over its destinies—the statesman who maintained so remarkable a hold upon the confidence and affections of Canadians that his power and policy seemed impregnable to any assailant but death. Even death has decorated his triumph, for upon the news of his approaching end a whole people stood smitten with grief, and admirers and adversaries showed how little they differed regarding the value of Sir John Macdonald's life to the Dominion. It is needless to say that his loss will be felt heavily far beyond the limits of Canada. The Queen, in her

sympathetic inquiries, has given expression to a regard felt by her subjects in the mother country and throughout the Empire. In these days of Greater Britain, a great colonial statesman fills an important place in history. Few foreign potentates are such important persons as he. His Cabinet administers tracts of territory by the side of which most of the kingdoms of Europe are mere patches. His colony can throw a foreign industry into consternation by raising the tariff by a few dollars. He sits with his finger on the valve which admits emigrants from the Old World. It is his to shape the proportions of a swiftly-growing giant, and no hereditary titles, no feudal tenures, or class traditions restrict the range of his experiments. In such places, be they pleasant or not, are cast the lines of a Premier of a great British colony. It was Sir John Macdonald's fortune to be the first colonial statesman to build up a reputation which should be world-wide. Sir Henry Parkes and Mr. Cecil Rhodes are others who have since done the same, but it is no disparagement to them, and especially to Mr. Rhodes, whose greatness lies chiefly in men's expectations, to say that they have made no name equal to Sir John Macdonald's. A legitimate feeling of pride in a man whom Britain sent forth seventy years ago, a child of six years old, to seek his fortune in the New World, is one reason why we join with the Canadians in deploring the death of their veteran. But in Sir John Macdonald we have also lost a statesman who, while severely practical in his measures, was deeply imbued with the sentiment of Imperial unity, and could be trusted to foster it with all the energy at his command. We cannot but remember that the latest development of his policy is the subsidizing of a magnificent line of armed steamers which, together with the Canadian Pacific Railway, is to put a British girdle round the world.

“We are indebted to Sir John Macdonald for evoking the most remarkable exhibition that Parliamentary institutions have ever afforded of constancy in a democratic electorate. Since 1878, when a general election carried him into power, the electors have given him a majority, greater or less, in three consecutive elections. For the same Minister to have won four general elections in succession is unexampled in the modern history of Parliamentary Government in Anglo-Saxon communities. No politician dares to say much in public about that most potent and constant of electoral forces, the temptation to ‘give the other side a turn.’ But no one is really under any illusion about it, and Sir John Macdonald's success is the exception which proves the rule. That success was all the more remarkable because the same electorate which kept Sir John Macdonald in power was all the time returning Radical majorities to the Provincial Legislatures—that is to say, majorities which were generally supposed to be hostile to Sir John Macdonald's policy. Mr. Goldwin Smith's explanation of this phenomenon may do very well for a party platform, but no candidly-minded man will believe that gerrymandering and log-rolling are quite so sure and uniform in their results as to smother for thirteen years the convictions of a people. It is an indubitable fact that Sir John Macdonald captivated the imaginations of the Canadians by a policy conceived on broad, patriotic principles, and appealing as strongly to national sentiment as it seemed to appeal to material interests. His 'National Policy' was the protest against absorption into the United States. Looking back at the past, we are able to see how almost irresistible would have been by this time the forces making for absorption, had not the 'National Policy' checked them in their beginnings. Even Canadian Federation, of which Sir John Macdonald was the foremost promoter, if not the originator, would have been powerless to stem the tide had not the provinces and territories of British North America been braced together by something more solid than an Act of Parliament. The Canadian Pacific Railway will be Sir John Macdonald's enduring monument. From one point of view it was the corollary of Canada's protective tariff—this last a bulwark against American encroachment, which, however natural, we at home cannot regard with unmixed feelings. But if the prime purpose of the Canadian Pacific was to knit together the Provinces of Canada, it has incidentally given the Empire an inestimable commercial and strategic advantage, and has imparted a colour of actuality to aspirations after Imperial Federation. No wonder that the 'National Policy' took root in the instincts of Canadians. In their own province the electors of Ontario and Quebec might indulge themselves with Radical Legislatures; but in regard to the broader interests of Canada they were faithful to what is commonly called Conservatism for want of a better name. It is extremely creditable to the good sense of the Canadians that they should have mastered the temptation to fickleness, and having once made their choice, should over and over again have renewed their mandate to Sir John Macdonald to carry it out courageously and consistently.

“In the midst of the mourning which attends the death of the great Canadian statesman, men cannot postpone asking—Who is to be his successor, and what will become of his party? Sir John Macdonald's personal popularity has so long been regarded as the most important factor in the success of the Conservatives that there was a temporary tendency to see in his impending death the signal for a general breaking of old ties and reconstruction of parties. People are now beginning to discover that the ideas of which Sir John Macdonald was the champion cannot be buried with him. They are his children; but it remains to be seen whether a majority of Canadians have adopted them for their own sakes, and not merely out of regard for the statesman who gave them birth. At the same time there is no use in denying that the disappearance of 'the Chieftain's' commanding personality is a heavy blow to the Conservative and Imperialist party. In the Dominion and, perhaps, other colonial Legislatures, it is perhaps easier to secure a majority than to keep it together. That is where the tact and personal popularity of Sir John Macdonald were so signally displayed. From the death of Canada's great Premier we must date a new period of doubt and danger during which Sir John Macdonald's successors will have to depend upon the intrinsic worth of the ideas he has bequeathed without the magic aid of his great personality."

* * * * *

"As a Parliamentary leader, Sir John Macdonald exhibited great abilities in debate, in general affairs, and political tactics. He was very frequently a delegate to England and to other countries on public business, and he always executed his delicate diplomatic missions with singular tact and skill. He bore so strong a facial resemblance to Lord Beaconsfield that he was styled "the Canadian Disraeli," and there was likewise a considerable similarity between their views of statesmanship. An "old Parliamentary hand" unmatched in Dominion politics, he excited among his followers a devotion which was invaluable to the Conservative party in keeping together the various groups of which it was composed. In the course of his long political career he carried to a successful issue many measures of the highest importance, in addition to those already enumerated in this article. Conspicuous amongst these measures may be cited the improvement of the criminal laws of Canada; the consolidation of the statutes; the extension of the municipal system; military organization; the establishment of a direct steam mail communication with Europe; the inspection of reformatories, prisons, penitentiaries, and asylums; the reorganization of the Civil Service on a permanent basis; the construction of the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific railways; the enlargement of the canals; the enactment of a stringent election law; the extension of the franchise; the ratification of the Washington treaty; and the extension and consolidation of the Dominion."

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

"It may be permitted to an Englishman—using the word in its widest sense as the name of all the white subjects of Her Majesty—to begin a notice of the late Sir John Macdonald by noting that he held a position which no man not born under the ruler of England could have held in any past time, or could hold now. He won himself the position of a statesman in a great community which was yet a colony of this Empire. The State which he governed has the resources and extent of many independent nations; but it was, of its own free will, only a part of a greater whole. * * * As a Parliamentary politician there is no reason to suppose that his capacity would have failed of its reward in any constitutionally governed country. The methods by which elections are won and parties are held together are not always free from smirch; but a ruler must, in the main, be judged by what he does in power, even though, in

W. H. ... Co.

Bacon's phrase, he has risen to dignities through indignities. It was intrinsically honourable to Choiseul that he rose by the help of La Pompadour, though it may be to his honour that he refused to retain his position at the price of an alliance with Mme. Du Barry. Yet nobody has denied that Choiseul was a great minister, and sincere in his efforts to secure what he believed to be the good of France. The Gerrymander and bribery of the constituencies by which Sir John Macdonald fortified, if he did not secure, his long tenure of office, are the modern democratic equivalent for the old-fashioned alliance with the king's mistress. Essentially, they are about as honourable as, though less agreeable than, their predecessor. Still, they are the conditions of the fight, and they must be conformed to by him who would win. After all, the great question concerning every fighter is, What did he do with his power when he had obtained it?

“To that question an answer can be given which is almost wholly honourable to Sir John Macdonald. His Commercial Policy was entirely wrong according to the principles which have been accepted in the Mother Country. He had no scruples in imposing duties on imports from England for the purpose of protecting Canadian industries. In this respect he shared the views of those English politicians who protected England against the competition of Irish woollen goods and cattle. But he had no more intention than they that these commercial taxes should lead to disruption of the Empire. There is absolutely no ground for supposing that he was other than perfectly honest in his declaration made during the late general election that he would die as he had lived, a subject of the Queen. Whatever measures he might introduce in Canada were meant to make the continuity of the Empire more and not less stable. It cannot be denied that during his life he succeeded triumphantly. The party which he led for so many years is still in power in Canada, and it is committed heartily to the policy which he had always defended. Sir John Macdonald was no mere ‘machine’ politician of the latest and worst American stamp. If he was not, as he has been called, the founder of the Canadian Federation, he at least helped materially to found it; and it was largely his doing that it has hitherto worked smoothly. The whole extent of the credit due to him for his management is not easily realizable by Englishmen. Yet it requires no great effort to understand in the main what a feat it has been to keep a community in which a large minority is French, Roman Catholic, and united, while a not overwhelming majority is English, Scotch, Irish, partly Roman Catholic, partly Protestant, and by no means united together, so that it has worked with some uniformity of aim and national sentiment. By the confession of his Parliamentary enemies themselves Sir John Macdonald did this. On their showing, then, he proved himself the greatest master of his weapons in that field on which it was his fortune to fight. After all, a man can do no more anywhere, and the conditions are far from easy in Canada. When it is remembered that his object all through was to preserve the unity of the Empire, it is not for us to be grudging in our admiration of him."

THE SPECTATOR.

"Sir John A. Macdonald distinctly wished to make of the Northern half of the North American Continent a great and powerful State, to weld all the peoples on it into a united nation, and to do this as long as possible under the shadow of the British throne. He was at heart, and inside all external professions and ways of acting, first of all a Canadian, and next a loyalist, so far as loyalism—we do not quite mean loyalty—is possible to an English-speaking person of this age whose business it is to think for a separate section of the Empire. He loved Canada and he liked the British Empire, and to those two things he would have postponed anything, his own judgment on right and wrong perhaps included. It was in his method, not his inner desires, that he was Lord Beaconsfield over again. * * * He had to govern and consolidate a bundle of populations with different origins, creeds, and degrees of civilization, and he managed to draw from them all a strongly united party, which agreed, while he moved in his well-understood direction, to obey his orders implicitly. * * * His great public works, for example, though always useful to the state, were commonly useful to his party also. We would question if he ardently believed in the protection with which he identified himself. Knowing exactly what he wanted, knowing thoroughly all his own people, Canadians, Irishmen, Orangemen, French Catholics, French Liberals, and knowing all men with whom he had ever come in contact, with a ready eloquence which, like Bismarck's, gave all readers a true impression of largeness, and a false impression of utter frankness, he almost always succeeded; and in his largest and most complex task, the welding of the Dominion, he succeeded beyond hope or expectation. * * * He loved power and success and reputation, and popularity as a basis for them all; but he loved the Dominion too, he more than any man helped to make it, and it is fitting that the Dominion, if it believes in itself—an assumption we have recently seen some reason to doubt, or it would not so dread the levelling of custom-houses—should honour the statesman who believed in it through life."

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"It is the misfortune of some great men to be generally unpopular, of others to be generally beloved. That Sir John Alexander Macdonald, late Prime Minister of Canada, deserved the adjective 'great' there is as little doubt as that he was personally liked by the people of the Dominion.

Men might doubt his political motives, or challenge his public judgment, but none doubted his heart. In the fray he was denounced, but out of it he was applauded. Always a fighter, he was buoyant in conflict, and altogether unsparing of his foes; ever a lover of men and books, he was possessed of an amiable cheerfulness and kindness which disarmed jealousies and eliminated the hurts that warfare had made. * Those who live at the heart of the Empire may well take heed of this man's life, it was that of a Briton to the bone; of his death, for who shall come after like to him in colonial statecraft, in breadth of ideas, in the possession of the faith of the people, in masterly grasp of national circumstances, in large conception of policy, in unwavering attachment of the British connection? No other man could so have inspired Canadians with confidence in their country as did he; none other so held in check the fighting elements, so smoothed away or toned to a note of unity the inharmonious characters of the Canadian national life. The Canada Sir John A. Macdonald knew in his first days of political life was a bundle of jealous provinces, and with Upper and Lower Canada united in a bond of political wedlock, in which there was neither peace nor advancement. He has left a strong Dominion, with Confederation not only an accomplished fact, but an accomplished success. He entered Parliament at a time when the union of the two Canadas, accomplished in 1841, was to so stir up dissatisfied faction among the French Canadians as to result in the destruction of the Parliament buildings at Montreal in 1849.

“The future Premier took his seat at the first session of the Legislature at Montreal in 1844. He was destined from the beginning of his career to associate himself with important public events, to take an outstanding position. He was only twenty-five years of age when he sprang into notice as a brilliant advocate by his defence of Von Shoultz, one of the rebels of 1837-38. This was four years after being called to the bar. He had only been in Parliament three years when he was asked to take the office of Receiver-General, and from that time forth he was a power in the land. For forty-seven years he has been in Parliament an unbroken record, and a minister during thirty-three of that period. He has held nearly every portfolio in the Cabinet of Canada—Receiver-General, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Attorney-General, Minister of Militia, Minister of the Interior, Minister of Justice, President of the Council, Secretary of State, and General Superintendent of Indian Affairs. He was Prime Minister as early as 1858, and was the first Prime Minister of the Dominion, taking office in 1867, and with the exception of the years from 1873 to 1878, keeping his party in power ever since.

“Sir John A. Macdonald was one of a race of Canadian statesmen now almost gone; the very few that remain are either in that peaceful retirement which the Senate of the Dominion affords, or have sunk into private life, forgotten of the people. Of the once puissant names, however, many are engraven upon tombs, one at least upon a statue, and the last and chiefest of them upon the hearts of the Canadian people. Baldwin, MacNab, George Brown, Taché, Morin, Hincks, Belleau, and Cartier—that ‘Englishman speaking French language,’—and many others as remarkable, are gone; but until yesterday Sir John remained the active and splendidly-renowned representative of a time when legislation in the Province of Canada and the separate Maritime Provinces was a much more difficult thing than it is in the Parliament of the Dominion. It was an accident of life that Sir John’s career was set in Canada; had it been in England, and had he devoted his life to politics here as he did there, the English House of Commons would in all probability have acknowledged him to be as illustrious in this greater sphere, as he was in the country where his name was a sufficient guarantee of public confidence, the rally-point of the popular faith. Men might attack his political methods, his party schemes, his means for keeping in power, but they never could seriously attack the sincerity of his desires to faithfully serve and soundly advance the interests of the land to which he had given his life’s labours, and behind the natural force there was in Confederation to impress the dangers attending provincial selfishness and wire-pulling strife for balance of power, it was felt that there was as a powerful safeguard, the personality of Sir John A. Macdonald.”

“Sir John inspired loyalty because he himself was loyal, and he trusted the instinct of loyalty in the people. In 1835 he dared to alienate the French population by hanging the rebel Louis Riel. Political, so far as Quebec was concerned, this was a dangerous move—it defeated the Conservative party in the French province; but he trusted to the general sentiment of the country, and the results showed that his policy of no compromise in this matter was right. Yet nothing stands out more strikingly in the history of Canada than what might be called the subjugation of Quebec by Sir John A. Macdonald. The French province was always to him a thing to be closely reckoned with in every political movement, but it has lost its power of upheaval, of successful resistance to other provinces, of sudden displacement in political and party machinery. Sir John reduced the racial sensitiveness by preferment and the considerate elevation of French-Canadian politicians to important posts and places in the Cabinet. But these were only the outward limits and flourishes, for behind ‘all means to concentrate’ there was a sound principle of union and amalgamation working. If Sir John A. Macdonald did not himself make Confederation he did most to make it possible at the time and he did most to preserve it. But he has also, of all Canadians, done most to preserve that larger spirit of Confederation which makes Canada loyal to the British Crown when lured most financially, oppressed most commercially, and influenced most socially, by its stronger neighbour at the south. His creed was ever that it was better to be poor and Canadian—that is British—than to be filled with American ‘enterprise’ and be governed by rings at Washington and New York, and his creed is the one by which Canadians stand. Travelling far and near, living in the United States or elsewhere, they do not desire to see Canada sell its heritage for a mess of pottage which is held out by advocates speaking in the name of the United States. To some unenthusiastic spectators Sir John’s advocacy of Imperial Federation, his constant iteration of loyalty, his flag-flying, and his accentuated ritual of patriotism may have seemed like Jingoism, but how deep that patriotism really was, how firm and true was the idea behind it, the history of the man’s life bears ample record, and nothing seems so fine in the career of this well-beloved servant of his country than his attitude towards young men. If he was diligent then to enlist them under the Conservative banner, he was equally diligent in instilling the love of country, the belief that there could be no finer, no more inspiring basis to character, than affection for and honourable fidelity to one’s native land. All young men who ever entered the magnetic, genial and convincing presence of this man carried with them ever after the conviction that whatever Sir John as a politician might do he was to be trusted as a Canadian, he was to be revered, honoured and followed, and to the credit of all classes in Canada be it said that there is no man, old or young, but laments the hour when ‘the Chieftain’ has gone to that quiet arena where there is no more fighting.”

MORNING POST.

“Sir John Macdonald’s work was not dependent on a versatile, magnetic personality. It was solid achievement in pursuit of principles that attended him from his earliest youth. He conceived the idea of building up a great British people in North America, formed out of the loyalist-refugees, whom Republican intolerance had expelled from their homes, out of the French colonists whom treaties had committed to our care. The whole cemented together by the most industrious of British emigrants, and in this work he has refused to listen to any theory of destiny bidding him accept immersion in Yankee democracy as his inevitable fate. This is the principle for which he has struggled for over forty years. This is the principle he has seen Canada affirm at a crisis of great moment.”

THE GRAPHIC.

“The death of the Canadian statesman, par excellence, has been aptly, if obviously, compared to the fall of a pillar of the Constitution. And the comparison would have been as gravely significant as it is apt had the fall of the pillar occurred a generation ago—for two generations, as they are counted, must be reckoned in connection with Sir John Macdonald. Thanks to him, the edifice of the whole Dominion has become so solidly settled as to be able to stand without the single pillar which at one time seemed to form its whole support. * * * He had the statesmanlike characteristic of being able to act with all parties in the sense of being no mere partisan, and of combining their conflicting energies, interests and prejudices to a common end, of which he never lost sight for a moment. Whatever is to be the future of Canada, she can at any rate never again fall to pieces, while every year that passes will strengthen her cohesion. In short, Sir John Macdonald found a number of scattered colonies and left a nation. This work of nation-making is one of the features of the close of this century, and will, no doubt, be a chief occupation of the next. And whatever is hereafter achieved in Australia, or in Africa, or elsewhere—and where not, who can tell?—will be largely due to Sir John Macdonald's solution of the problem in an instance of supreme difficulty."

THE EXAMINER AND TIMES (Manchester).

"Canada's 'Perpetual Premier' is dead. After a severe struggle, he who has been 'always a fighter,' and has mostly come off victorious, has succumbed, leaving the fortunes of the Dominion in the hands of younger men, the majority of whom have been trained by him either as followers or opponents; for in politics, as in warfare, men learn by defeat as well as by the exercise of the responsibilities attendant upon success. Sir John Macdonald's name has latterly been prominently before English readers, to many of whom a few years ago his name was probably unknown; but there can be no doubt that in him Canada possessed a statesman of whom any country might have been proud—one who, had he remained on this side of the Atlantic, would have taken a place in the first rank of Imperial statesmen. His forty-seven years of Parliamentary life have been mainly spent in office and in the conduct of negotiations; and the fact that, during the twenty-five years since Canada was confederated, he has been Premier for twenty years shows that he knew the secret of governing a country more complex in its organization than any self-governing nation, with the sole exception of the Austrian Empire. He has been likened on the one hand to Prince Bismarck, on the other to the late Signor Depretis; in adroitness as a 'House of Commons man,' and in what has been called 'the exuberance of his antique youthfulness,' he bore a strong resemblance to Mr. Gladstone, while there was a marked facial similarity between him and Lord Beaconsfield. Upon this latter point, the testimony of Sir Charles Dilke is worth recalling: 'The first time that I saw Sir John Macdonald,' he wrote, 'was shortly after Lord Beaconsfield's death, and as the clock struck midnight. I was starting from Euston station, and there appeared on the step of the railway carriage, in Privy Councillor's uniform (the right to wear which is confined to so small a number of persons, that one expects to know by sight those who wear it), a figure precisely similar to that of the late Conservative leader, and it required, indeed, a severe exercise of presence of mind to remember that there had been a City banquet, from which the apparition must be coming, and to rapidly arrive by a process of exhaustion at the knowledge that this twin brother of that Lord Beaconsfield, whom shortly before I had seen in the sick room which he was not to leave, must be the Prime Minister of Canada.' Here, however, in the opinion of Sir Charles Dilke, the similarity ended ; but, while it is perfectly true that the Canadian Premier never affected that air of mystery which was so often noticed in Lord Beaconsfield, there is another direction in which a parallel may be drawn, and that is the trust and affection which he inspired in those with whom he associated, and in his subordinates. He has been well served, because those who served him knew that they would never be sacrificed vicariously.

An instance of the firm support upon which his friends knew that they could count has been seen only during the last month. It is, moreover, an instance of parliamentary audacity such as only Palmerston or Beaconsfield, among our political leaders of the last fifty years, would have ventured upon. * * * It was, however, his loyalty to those with whom he co-operated, and his marvellous power of weighing and selecting men, that gave him a commanding position over all other Canadian statesmen. He was at once respected and loved by the heads of the various administrative departments, whom he always treated as colleagues, and, knowing of what they were capable, trusted implicitly with the due performance of his general instructions. They knew well that he would not pester them with unnecessary interferences in matters of detail, and that if they were loyal to him they would not need a defender. In this seems to have been one of the secrets of his wonderful success ; but an additional, and doubtless the prime, factor in securing his position, was the fact that he had always at heart the interests of Canada, and, joined with those, the interests of the Empire. His policy has often been attacked as extravagant. Of its costliness there can be no question ; but he saw clearly that the only chance for the future prosperity of Canada lay in the development of her resources and the utilization of her geographical situation, and that, such being the case, extravagance consisted not in a liberal expenditure, but in what is often falsely regarded as economy. The task of building up a country involves the sinking of capital, often without an immediate return in hard cash. It was this 'National Policy' which induced Sir John Macdonald to include in his programme protective tariffs, beyond what might have been strictly necessary for raising revenue in a country where the collection of direct taxes is impracticable ; and though it is probable that Canada would have made greater head-way had her import trade been subjected to few restrictions, she has undoubtedly progressed rapidly and solidly."

BY MR. MARTIN J. GRIFFIN.

"Sir John Macdonald was Imperial in all his ideas concerning the object and destiny of the Dominion of Canada. It was to establish and perpetuate a bulwark of British power on this continent that he made such efforts at conciliating all the political forces of the Upper and Lower Provinces in order to effect the Confederation of 1867. He was at the same time a passionate Canadian; and while he kept one hand on the petulant passions that would sometimes rise against Imperial authority among our people, he often, with the other, repressed the aggressive imperialism of some new Colonial Minister in London. The time for writing fully on those things will not come in this generation. An example may be given. When he formed one of the High Commission to negotiate a treaty at Washington, in 1871, he was blamed by many in Canada for having made too liberal concession of Canadian interests to British interests. When the "Life of Sir Stafford Northcote" was recently published, it was found that Sir John Macdonald had pressed beyond almost the legitimate bounds the patience and the policy of the British Ministers, in the interests of Canada. The proof of his success was found in the Halifax Award.

"It was partly for Imperial purposes that he pressed on the building of the Intercolonial Railway, which alone could have contributed to the earlier stages of the successful development of the Dominion. It was partly for Imperial purposes that he opened up the North-West to be a home for the emigrating citizens of Great Britain. British statesmen less wise than he have not given him enough aid in turning the stream of emigration into that prepared and splendid field where now the pioneer may go, finding at his door, however remote, the post, the railway, the telegraph, the school, the resources of religious teaching, medical skill, and of a civilizing literature. It was partly for Imperial purposes that he took his political life, and the political lives of all his friends and followers, in his hand to accomplish the task of building the Pacific Railway, to which now not merely the subscribed capital but also the credit and honour and interests of Canada, and the interests of the Empire too, are in greater or less degree pledged.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD'S GRAVE, CATARAQUI CEMETERY, KINGSTON.

“Toward the sister Republic the attitude of Sir John Macdonald was one of admiring rivalry. It was his determination that there should never be on this continent only one nation; part of it was to be British always. For that reason he was cautious in developing every resource of this country, and for this purpose the National Policy of 1858, which was simply an imitation of the protective system of the United States modified by circumstances, was adopted and maintained by him always. But he was never averse to trade relations with the United States, on terms which could be considered fair to both countries. The proof of his earnestness in this respect is to be found in dates and facts. It was a Government, of which he was an influential member, carried the Treaty of 1854 into operation. In 1865 he endeavoured to secure its renewal. In 1869 he caused negotiations to be entered on for renewal. In 1871 he endeavoured to arrange a partial Treaty of Reciprocity. In 1874 he acquiesced in the missions which his opponents, then in power, sent to Washington. In 1888 he again made a friendly offer to the United States, and when he died he was in a friendly negotiation with Mr. Blaine, and a meeting had been fixed for October next.

“His character as a Conservative was peculiar. He entered public life at a time when the power of the old Tories of the Loyalist period was waning; and he made no effort to maintain that power. He took in hand the slowly approaching power of the Democracy and made it serve the purpose of a moderate and progressive conservatism, which some of the older politicians looked on with suspicion, as if it might be Radicalism in disguise. As Pitt brought in the masses to control the traditional powers of the classes, so Sir John Macdonald was the man who made the franchise for the Dominion elections more democratic than it had ever been—so much so that but a faint line divides it from universal suffrage. He had a leaning, too, towards Female Suffrage; but that was never particularly marked, and only evinced tentatively during a prolonged and annoying debate. He was opposed to divorce courts with much firmness. He hated all forms of irreligion; and though he was accessible to all new ideas, he was not easily accessible to anything that bore the stamp or faintest impression of irreverence toward established beliefs and practices. He had the highest regard for the Clergy in general, as representing to him a divine order, a social power—a conservative influence; and the Clergy, as a body, held him in an affectionate esteem, though his light-hearted audacity never allowed him to put on an air of solemnity for the mere sake of appearances. He was intensely conservative of the dignity and ability of the Judicial Bench, from the highest to the lowest rank; and among the very numerous appointments made by him, not more than two or three were ever publicly criticised. He did not confine these appointments to his own party, but sought out the best man wherever he could be found; the Bench of Canada, consequently, commands respect by its character as well as by its ability. He was conservative, too, of the permanence of the public service, and the Civil Service Act, which is very conservative, was not sufficiently so to suit him, though as much so as he could have carried through the House.

His characteristics as a public man were marked and interesting. No Roman Senator could robe himself in dignity and speak with more stately precision than could Sir John Macdonald on state or great occasions; his respect for Parliament was such that he never, or very rarely, took the slightest liberty with the general sense of the House for order and calmness. On the other hand, when on the stump, or in convention, no could be more joyous, more amusing, more apparently careless in anecdote, in expression, in quotation; his old stories had been laughed at by two generations of men and a dozen new sets of electors all over the country; and he took no pains to repair or renew them, because he knew "the boys" expected them, and were ready to laugh the moment he approached the subject which the favourite old story was to illustrate. His oratory was not a great oratory, his voice was not strong, but was distinct and clear as a Scottish accent always makes any voice. He was not addicted to perorations and purple patches in his speech. He used anecdote, however, often and effectively. He was hesitating in manner; but the exquisite precision of phrase which marked his speeches showed always that he never spoke at random. He was a singularly industrious man. The letters he wrote personally, in a hand so like a woman's hand of the past generation, were remarkable for their number; and it is a singular thing that in all that enormous private correspondence there have been few breaches of confidence on the part of his correspondents.

"In private life, that life which his friends found so delightful, Sir John Macdonald was what no pen save perhaps the late Lord Beaconsfield's could describe. His kindness never failed in any least little courtesy of life. To the oldest he was cordial and friendly; to the youngest he was caressing and reassuring.—His presence in any room was the signal for an encircling gathering to whom he would talk all at once. If any one had a pet study, Sir John Macdonald was sure, in a skilful and delicate way, to make him talk a little of it. If any one was fond or full of anecdotes, the old Premier would be sure to give the opening for the last good thing. He himself was sure to have read the last new book worth reading, and to have got at the pith of it quickly. He kept well up with the reviews as well as with the books. A few days before he entered on the campaign of 1891 he was in the Library of Parliament, and amid much talk of other things, he expressed his high appreciation of the admirable article in the London Spectator on Cardinal Newman ; he gave some anecdotes of Lord Houghton which have not appeared in print ; and an adventure with the late Walter Bagehot at a London dinner-party ; he explained his opinion as to the reasons why the Whigs dealt ungratefully by Edmund Burke, and gave a short account of a conversation with Lord Beaconsfield.

* * * * *

“ As I write, they have carried his body in a stately and solemn way into the Senate Chamber, to lie in state, to be looked upon for the last time by the people who knew him so well in life. Flowers and guards and stately ceremony make a solemn and touching surrounding for this man who has never needed guards before, and to whom ceremony, when he was the object of it, was not always pleasing. And again, there comes rising in my mind and ringing in my ears the tender lament of Sir Ector de Maris :

“ ‘ Thou never were matched of none earthly knight’s hands ; and thou were the courtliest knight that ever beare shield ; and thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse ; ’ and so let us pass from his presence to cherish his memory with a loyal affection which time must fail to extinguish.’

THE PACIFIC SCANDAL.

The following is the speech delivered by Sir John Macdonald, in reply to the allegations concerning the pacific railway charter, in the house of commons, Ottawa, on Monday, Nov. 3rd, 1873. On rising, the honourable gentleman was greeted with hearty cheers :—

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to address you on the two motions now before the house, and the reason why I did not so intend is that I had already given my testimony on oath, and in that testimony I had endeavoured, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, to state the whole case as far as I knew it, according to the best of my conscience, concealing nothing and revealing everything. Therefore I did not think it well, according to the ordinary rule, that I should attempt in any way to supplement my statement on oath by my statements not on oath. (Cheers.) However I have been taunted, not in the house certainly, but I have heard it elsewhere and have seen it in the papers that I have been withholding my statements ; that I have been keeping back, and that I dare not meet the house and the country. Sir, I dare meet this house and the country. (Cheers.) I know too well what the house and the country will do, and what the feeling of the country will be, when they know all the facts. They know many of them now, and those they do not know I shall endeavour presently to enter upon. But now I enter upon the subject which is most interesting to this house—the question whether the government or any members of the government were in any way implicated in the giving or granting of a charter, or of a privilege of any kind to men for corrupt motives. I shall allude to one or two subjects which a short time ago assumed prominence in the opinion of the country, but which in the course of the present debate have almost sunk into insignificance. A short time ago, from the 13th August till now, we heard nothing else but the unconstitutionality of the prorogation ; nothing else but that a great wrong had been committed on the privileges of the house. Although I was here for only a few minutes before the house was prorogued, if I remember aright, this chamber rung with charges that the privileges of the house had been invaded. I not only heard the voice of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), but I saw his hand brought down, with the ponderous strength of the hon. gentleman, on his desk, when he called "privilege!" "privilege!" and all because the representative of the sovereign had exercised a prerogative conferred upon him by law. The hon. gentleman was committing an anachronism. There were days when the prerogative of the crown and the privileges of the people were in opposition. There were days—but they were days long gone by, and there was no necessity for any attempt to revive them now—days when the prerogative of the crown was brought in opposition to the will of the people, and the representatives of the people; and then, as was proper, the will of the people was paramount, and when the crown opposed it, by prerogative or by excess of prerogative, the head of the sovereign rolled on the scaffold. But, Mr. Speaker, those days do not exist now, and I am happy to say that at this moment, in this age, the prerogative of the crown is a portion of the liberty of the people. (Cheers.) If we wish to preserve our liberties, if we wish to preserve our present constitution, if we do not wish again to have a long parliament or a rump parliament, if we do not wish again to have a parliament overriding every other constitutional authority, we shall preserve the prerogative of the crown as being a sacred trust, as being a portion of the liberties of the people. (Cheers.) Centuries ago, as I have said, the time was when the sovereign could come down with his strong hands and could seize, or attempt at all events to seize, a member of parliament for performing his duty in his place. The day was once when the sovereign could come down and could banish and send to the tower, and even as has been known, could send to the block, members of parliament for defending the privileges of the people. But when the sovereign is no longer a despot, when the sovereign is a constitutional monarch, when the sovereign takes his advice from the people, when the sovereign in his act of prerogative takes his advice from a committee selected from the representatives of the people and from the other Chamber, which other chamber has its power resting upon the basis of the will of the country and the will of the people, then I say there is no danger of the prerogative being used unconstitutionally; but the great danger of the country here, as in England, is that the prerogative may not be strong enough to resist the advancing wave of democracy. (Cheers.) And, sir, when in the undoubted exercise of the prerogative of the crown the representative of the sovereign came not to this Chamber but to the proper chamber, and announced his will, as the representative of the sovereign, that parliament be prorogued, he committed no breach of the privileges of this house or the other house of parliament, and made no infringement on the liberties of the people. (Cheers.) It was charged that a great breach of the constitution had taken place. True it is that we heard in a sort of minor key from the Globe, which had some character to lose, that although it was very inexpedient, it was no breach of the constitution. But every other paper, I believe, every organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, except the Globe, stated that there had been a great breach of the constitution and of the privileges of the people on the floor of parliament, and they were countenanced by the voice and clamour of hon. gentlemen opposite. (Cheers.) We might pardon them, perhaps, because we have seen cases of a similar kind in England, and therefore I can quite understand it, and I do not much blame them, as showing the momentary feeling of disappointment at the exercise of the royal prerogative, preventing the extension of the excitement into debates in a subsequent session. In 1820, at the time of Queen Caroline's trial, while the bill was pending, when it was resolved to withdraw the bill, and when the motion for the six months' disposal of that measure was carried, there was an outburst when the knock of the usher of the black rod was made at the door—an outburst of indignation on the part of the queen's friends because they had no opportunity of expressing their feelings against the course which had been taken. Parliament, however, was prorogued, notwithstanding the storm of indignation that arose at the time. On a still later occasion, at the time of the reform bill, in 1831, we can remember how the house was almost in mutiny, and how that staid gentleman, the Duke of Richmond, almost declared himself in rebellion against his sovereign. Sir Robert Peel, at the very moment the usher of the black rod knocked at the door, was making a most indignant protest against prorogation for the purpose of dissolution. Therefore when such staid men and men of such high position could take that course, we can perhaps pardon hon. gentlemen opposite for having betrayed an unseemly warmth on the 13th of August because the prerogative of the crown was exercised as the crown had the right to exercise it. Therefore, it occurs to every hon. gentleman who has considered the subject well, that the question of constitutionality cannot exist for a moment, and that a question of privilege set up against prerogative is altogether a false cry, an untenable cry, a cry unconstitutional and unwarranted by law. (Cheers.) The prerogative at present is valuable only as one of the liberties of the people, and it is one of the liberties of the people because it is guided, as I said before, by the advice of ministers responsible to the two houses of parliament, not alone to this chamber. The prerogative is not dangerous. There is no hazard that any one of our liberties, personal or political, will be endangered, so long as the prerogative is administered on the advice of a minister having the support and requiring support from the two chambers of parliament. (Cheers.) The question then comes, whether the present ministers of his excellency the governor-general were justified in recommending the prorogation on the 13th day of August. Sir, if they had not given that advice they would have the sovereign to break his word ; they would have advised the sovereign to commit a breach of faith against every absent member of parliament. I can say in the presence of this house, in the presence of the country, and in the presence of the world, if the world were listening to our rather unimportant affairs, that if ever a pledge, if ever a bargain, if ever an agreement or arrangement was made, it was that the house should be prorogued on the 13th day of August. Some of the gentlemen who have spoken, I won't tax my memory as to which of them, have made the constitutional objection that the house never agreed to the prorogation on the 13th of August. Sir, the house had nothing to do with it. It is not a matter of agreement between the sovereign and the people ; it is a matter of prerogative. Did any educated man, any man who knows what the constitution in Canada or what the constitution in England is, believe that I, the first minister of the crown, could get up in my place and tell this house that on the 13th of August it would be prorogued, and that on that day there was no real necessity for members being present, because it was to be merely a formal meeting ? that I, a minister of nearly twenty years standing—(hear)—who ought to know by practice, and do know by study, somewhat of the British constitution, should make that announcement unless I had got the authority of my master ; had got the sanction of the crown ? As a matter of course, as his excellency has stated in the answer he made to the gentlemen who waited upon him, I submitted the proposition to his excellency and took his pleasure upon it, just as the first minister in England would take the pleasure of her majesty as to the day on which prorogation was to take place. I got the sanction of his excellency the governor-general to make that statement, and if I had not got that sanction I do not believe the house would have agreed to the long adjournment. We will look back for one moment to see whether I was right, whether the government was right—in speaking of myself I speak of myself and my colleagues whether we ought to receive the sanction of the the house in giving that advice. Let us look back to the circumstances of the case. I invite the careful attention of the house, and especially the attention of those hon. members who were not members of the parliament of Canada at that time, to the circumstances of the case. In February, I think it was, there was a royal charter given for the purpose of building a Pacific railway, to the Pacific railway company. They went home—their president, Sir Hugh Allan and certain other members of the Board for the purpose of attempting to carry out this charter which had been given to them. The charter had been given to them according to the vote of the Parliament of Canada, with the sanction of the parliament of Canada, and every clause of it was in accordance with the provisions of the law passed by the parliament of Canada. (Cheers.) These gentlemen had gone home to England to lay a great scheme, so great a scheme, Mr. Speaker, that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite said that it was going to overtax our resources and destroy our credit, and that they could not succeed at all with so small a population in such a young country. They had gone home to England to lay the project before the English world and European capitalists. They were going home to operate, and it depended much on the support they received from this country, from the parliament and press of Canada, whether they could succeed or not. They had gone home in February. Parliament met early in March, I think. The hon. member for Shefford rose in his place and made his charge against the government on the 2nd of April. The hon. gentleman may have been, I do not say he was not, actuated by principles of fine patriotism in making that charge; but whether he was so actuated or not, whether his motives were parliamentary or unparliamentary, patriotic or unpatriotic, one thing is certain, that the direct aim, the direct object, the point at which that motion and that statement were directed, was to kill the charter in England. (Cheers.) The weapon was aimed with that object, not so much with the desire of destroying the administration, not so much with the purpose of casting a reflection upon the ministry, as with the view of destroying that first on the expectation that the ministry would fall afterwards. That was the aim; there was no doubt about it, and when the hon. gentleman's motion was defeated, and when I took up the resolution the aim was well intended—the desire of killing was well intended—but it failed in the execution. (Hear, hear.) When I took it up I considered the whole position of events. Sir Hugh Allan and those connected with him went to England in March. Parliament was sitting at the time the hon. gentleman made his motion. I could not know how long parliament would last, and the chances were that they would return some time before the end of the session. If they did not return then, of course I considered that there could be no examination until they did, but I thought they might return. I declare that I never for a moment supposed that the hon. member, when he made his statement, could be guilty of such great, such palpable, such obvious injustice, as to press his committee in the absence of Sir Hugh Allan, Mr. Abbott, and Sir George Cartier, when they had no opportunity of defending either themselves or the charter which they had obtained. The house must remember also that the motion made by the hon. gentleman went much farther than my motion. The motion of the hon. member, which he moved on the 2nd of April, was not only to inquire into the facts that he mentioned, the statements upon which he based his motion, but to go into the whole of the subject connected with the charter and the granting of the charter to the Pacific railway company. The aim of his motion, I repeat, was to destroy that charter. I will read the motion of the hon. member. After detailing the facts, he moved, "that a committee of seven members be appointed to inquire into all the circumstances connected with the negotiations for the construction of the Pacific railway, with the legislation of last session on the subject, and with the granting of the charter to Sir Hugh Allan and others." So that the aim of the hon. gentleman in making that motion was not simply to attack the government, not simply that from improper motives or inducements of any kind they had given the charter, but was for the purpose of destroying that charter and of attacking all the legislation of the previous session on which the charter was based. I never for one moment supposed that any hon. member would be guilty of the gross injustice of attempting to attack the whole of the legislation of the previous session and the charter solemnly granted under an act of parliament, and of attempting to affect vested interest, on which a million of money had been staked, in the absence of the persons primarily interested. That motion was made, and was intended to be a vote of want of confidence. Was that so? or was it not so? Will the hon. gentleman say it was not so?

Mr. HUNTINGTON—The motion when made was intended to express precisely what it did express. (Laughter.)

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—It is said, sir, that if there had been one honest man in the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah they might have been saved; and so the Opposition may be saved in the same way, for they have one honest man in their ranks—the member for South Wentworth—who stated that that motion was intended to be a vote of want of confidence. Everybody knew that that was its design (hear, hear), and yet at this day, at this late hour, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Huntington) had not the manliness to get up and say so. (Cheers.) He dare not say it was not a motion of want of confidence. It was meant in that way, and I can prove that it was by my hon. friend the member for South Wentworth. I call him, and I believe him. He said it was so. Will the hon. gentleman not believe him? Although differing from him in politics, I know he would not say what was not true. If I remember rightly, the hon. member for Shefford said he would make the motion when we went into committee of supply. He gave the necessary notice that is always given in such cases, and I certainly supposed that he intended to make a general motion on our policy connected with the Canadian Pacific railway. He said he was going to make a motion on that subject, and it was by mere accident that when my friend, the minister of finance, rose to make his budget speech, with you in the chair, instead of a committee of supply, the hon. member said he would take another opportunity of making the statement in connection with the Pacific railway. Had we gone into committee of supply the hon. gentleman would have made, in the ordinary parliamentary way, his motion of want of confidence. But he should have given notice of his attack, for a more unmanly attack is unknown. What notice had been given that he was going to make that motion? True, the government of the day are unworthy of their position unless they are ready to meet any charges brought against them. But had we the most remote information respecting that personal matter? And even when on the second day he announced that he was going to postpone to a future occasion further action, he did not venture to give the slightest intimation to the men he was going to attack; the men whose characters he was going to blacken; of what he was going to say; but he took us by surprise and sought by bringing in documents carefully prepared to get a committee on those statements for the purpose. Certainly it would have been so if the committee had been granted as he proposed,—of killing, as it was designed to kill, as it was bound to kill, the efforts of the Canadian people to get a body of English capitalists, to build the Pacific railway. (Loud cheering.) He could not possibly have supposed that he would have got the inquiry through that session, but he supposed if the house had granted the committee on his statement, and it had gone home, telegraphed by cable by the associated press, with which some hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to have mysterious connections—(laughter)—it would certainly have been mysterious but it would certainly have affected the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, throwing back for years the building of the railway, casting discredit on Canada, and telling British Columbia what they had told them two years before, that they were not going to get the railway. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did not speak, in his remarks on the motion, of facts within his own knowledge, and as the member for Marquette had done in his statements of facts, he only stated that he was credibly informed that the fact existed, and he would be able to prove it, and I venture to say that in the whole range of parliamentary experience in England, and wherever else fair play is known, no man could be expected to have got any other answer than the one he got from the house. If the hon. member had risen in his place and said of his own knowledge that he was personally cognizant of certain facts, then the house might have considered those facts as proved, at all events sufficient for a prima facie case for inquiry, but the hon. member for Shefford did not pretend to say so, but rose in the house and said he was credibly informed of certain facts, and thereupon asked for a committee to try the government, and not only so, but to try whether the legislation of the previous session was corrupt or non corrupt; whether the members of parliament who had voted for the Government were right or wrong, and whether that charter, to which great credit was attached, was fraudulent or valid. And on the nonce, when the hon. gentleman made the proposition, we resolved to leave it to the house to say whether they believed that the facts had occurred. When the hon. gentleman stated that he was credibly informed that such was true, the house voted down the motion. On the next day I gave notice that I would introduce the resolution which I did introduce. I gave notice of the resolution, and there is a little history with the resolution to which I will call the attention of the house. It is reported that at a meeting at New Glasgow the hon. member for Lambton stated that that resolution which I moved was forced upon me by my own followers, and that members on this side of the house had come to me to urge me to introduce that resolution. The hon. gentleman had heard my denial. He heard my speech; he was in his place when I made that speech, and interrupted me several times, and I then turned round and asked my friends if any of them had come to me to force me by any influence, or language, or anything of the kind, to come down to the house with that motion. I should like to know the names of those eight members,

Mr. MACKENZIE—I am quite satisfied I never mentioned eight names. (Ministerial cries of “How many?”) I said I was informed, as I was, that it was because of the pressure his supporters had brought to bear that an inquiry had been asked for next day.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (Pictou)—I wish to state what did occur at the meeting, and there will, I think, be no difference of opinion between the member for Lambton and myself as to the question of fact. The hon. member during his address stated that the leader of the government was compelled by the pressure of his own friends in the house—I don’t recollect that he stated eight members—to bring down the motion for a committee to the house. I interrupted and said; “Why, did you not hear Sir John Macdonald declare that he did not introduce that resolution owing to the pressure of his friends or of any friend?” The hon. gentleman replied; “I did not. I now declare he was pressed by his friends.”

Mr. MACKENZIE—The statement made by the hon. member for Pictou is quite correct. I stated I had no recollection of that statement being made, but as the hon. gentleman had said that it was made, I was bound to believe it; but I was still prepared to say that the information I had was that the leader of the Government was compelled by the pressure of his friends to make that mo'ion. I am borne out in that by what the member for Shelburne stated the other day in the House, He for one was obliged to bring that pressure to bear the next day. (Opposition cheers.) I cannot recollect all the others, but I heard similar matters mentioned by some others.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—I have got the speech here, and before the debate closes I shall refer to it, because I do not like any misapprehension on these matters. I am satisfied the hon. gentleman said so, as he is reported, and I can state here that the hon. gentleman had his own reporter present. The hon. gentleman was reported to have said :—“ I may inform the hon. gentleman there were eight of the Government supporters who put the screw on him.” In other words—

Mr. MACKENZIE—I am perfectly certain I did not use the word screw.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—Now, I have occasion to repeat what I stated then, that no member of the party, and not only no member of the party but not one of my own colleagues, spoke to me on the subject until I had announced my own determination. (Loud cheers from Ministerial benches.) The motion took us by surprise, and we met it, as I think we ought to have met it by voting it down. Next day I came down late and walked into the Council-room at half-past one. My colleagues were all sitting around. I said to them, after consideration: “ I have made up my mind that I will move for a Committee,” before any one had spoken. I had stated my intention without a single suggestion from any man, that as the charge was of such a nature that I would move for the appointment of a Committee and bring such motion before Parliament on the following day. And that is the way that the characters of men are lied away in this country. I do not mean to say that the hon. member for Lambton has lied down my character because he has denied it. What I do mean to say, it has been lied away by the mistake of a reporter who thought that he was reporting his words. I have now got the report here. It is from the Halifax Citizen. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows this paper? Perhaps the hon. member knows that his friend who formerly sat in this House for Halifax is the proprietor of this paper, or that he certainly writes for it. (Hear, hear and cheers.) Here is the newspaper, and if the hon. gentleman thinks I have made a mistake, and if he thinks I have done him an injustice, perhaps he will be patient with me while I read the few sentences :—“ Some gentlemen afterwards informed Sir John Macdonald that before they voted with him an inquiry there must be. He was thus compelled to come down and say that he himself moved an inquiry on the following day.”

Mr MACKENZIE—What about the eight that the hon. member spoke of. (Laughter.) I refer to what the hon. member for Shelburne stated the other night.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—Does the hon. member for Shelburne say that he ever came to speak to me on the subject?

Mr. ROSS (Victoria)—I may say that two or three of us went to see the Ministers next day and stated that unless they promised a committee themselves that was the last vote they would get from us.

Mr. CHURCH—I accept that statement. We saw the hon. Mr. Mitchell on the following day and said the charges were very serious affairs, and that a committee must be appointed.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—Thus we see another exemplification of the old story of the three Black Crows. (Laughter.) The hon. member stated that eight of my followers and supporters came to me and said that I must move that Committee. The hon. gentlemen say that they went to some one else, and I say, in the presence of my colleagues, that I myself went down to the council, and before having met or agreed with any single member of the council, I said to them on going into the council chamber—“Gentlemen, I have made up my mind that on the first opportunity that presents itself I will move for a committee to inquire into this matter.” (Cheers.) I had had no communication with any member of the government; no communication with any member of the house; no communication with any one in or out of the house, and therefore you can understand how guarded the hon. member for Lambton should be in giving publicity to other men’s affairs. He may perhaps have a vacancy in his memory. There is something, Abercrombie says, which leads men not only to forget certain facts, and to state things as facts that never occurred. At all events, whether I was waited on by the eight members or not, I shall produce the hon. gentleman the report about the eight members before the night is over.

Mr. MACKENZIE—I don’t care about it.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—I know you don’t. I know the hon. gentleman is quite indifferent about the evidence that I can produce. (Laughter.) At all events I came down to parliament and gave my notice of motion. Now I wish the house carefully to consider the circumstances under which I made my motion. I was of course exceedingly anxious that Sir Hugh Allan should succeed in his mission to England, and that the Pacific railway should be proceeded with without delay. I was anxious that no blow should be struck in this house for party or any other purpose that could injure the prospects of these men in England, and yet I did not desire that there should be any undue delay in this inquiry, which affected the honour of hon. gentlemen and of myself. Now it must be remembered that my motion having been unanimously adopted by the house, was not only my motion, was not only my vote, but was also the motion and the vote of hon. gentlemen who were then members of this parliament. I considered at that time that the chances were infinitesimally small that these gentlemen would be back in time to go on with the inquiry before the prorogation of parliament; and what did I move? I moved "that a select committee of five members be appointed, of which Committee the mover shall not be one," and here, Mr. Speaker, I may perhaps bring in, par parenthese, a remark. I moved that resolution as I thought that I being one of the accused should not be a member of that committee, and yet the hon. member for Shefford stated in a speech recently that if he had had his own way he would have been the chairman of that committee; that he would have been chairman and that he would have guided the deliberations of that committee—he the accuser. The hon. gentleman may think that I may have committed something like folly in this course, but, at all events, I moved that "a committee of five members be appointed, of which the mover shall not be one, to inquire into and report on the special matters mentioned in the resolution of the hon. member for Shefford, with power to send for papers and records, with power to report to the house from time to time, with power to report their evidence to the house from time to time, and if need be to sit after the prorogation of parliament." I thought that by a mere lucky chance, by a mere fortuitous circumstance, Sir Hugh Allan and his associates might perhaps raise the money, make the necessary arrangements and be back in time before parliament was prorogued, and, therefore, I put in merely as an alternative that if need be the committee could sit after parliament prorogued. I never thought for a single moment, it never occurred to my mind, that any man having a sense of justice would enter upon a trial of a matter, in the absence of those who were chiefly implicated, and perhaps you will say that the government were implicated, but at all events Sir Hugh Allan and Mr. Abbott were not only personally implicated, but their capital, their vested rights, their pledged faith were all interested in this inquiry, and I never thought any man would attempt such an effort of lynch law as to go on in the absence of Sir Hugh Allan, Hon. Mr. Abbott, and Sir Geo. Cartier; in the absence of all the evidence which these gentlemen could give on the subject of these charges. I therefore, sir, drew up the motion in the manner I have named, and I must confess that I am somewhat ashamed that my knowledge of constitutional law should have been at fault; but I was anxious that the government should not lie under the charges for a whole year, and I put that in the resolution in order that the commission might sit from day to day during the recess, and if Sir Hugh Allan, Mr. Abbott and Sir George Cartier arrived in this country that their evidence might be taken. This was my object in placing this clause in the resolution. On consideration we found that this house could not confer the power, and for a very substantial reason, because if this parliament could appoint a committee with power to sit during the recess it could also appoint a committee of the whole house to sit during the recess, and thus the prerogative of the Crown to prorogue would be invaded, and parliament as a committee of the whole might sit indefinitely. But I made a mistake ; it was accepted by the whole house, and hon. gentlemen who voted for my resolution are as much responsible for it as myself. Not only was my proposition considered, but it was weighed by the hon. member for South Bruce. So much did the hon. member consider it as a matter of certainty that the committee must sit during the recess that he used this language : " With regard to giving the committee power to sit after the prorogation, he thought the correct course to pursue would be to introduce a bill authorizing the committee to sit during the recess, and by a resolution of the house to take evidence under oath." The hon. gentleman saw that it was quite impossible for us to get through the investigation during the session, and I do not see in justice how it was possible to get through without these gentlemen coming. Have I not then proved my case, Mr. Speaker ? (Cheers.) Have I not proved that this house solemnly resolved, as far as it could resolve, that this enquiry should be continued after the prorogation ? Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not elaborate this question any further than to say that believing as I did, believing as I do, that it would have been an injustice to proceed with this enquiry in the absence of the gentlemen whom I have named, the government, of which I am a member, offered the advice to the governor-general that the house should be prorogued on the 13th of August, it having been understood that in the intermediate time the committee might sit. That advice was accepted, that was the advice I brought down and communicated to the house, and that advice was acted upon by this house and that act this house cannot now recall. (Hear, hear.) This house is responsible for its own acts and ordinances, and when I announced here that the house would be prorogued on the 13th of August, this house accepted that proposition as it should have done. (Cheers.) But, Sir, I stated to this house for all the purposes of this house that the adjournment should be considered a prorogation. (Cheers.) That was accepted by this house, and more than that, I brought down a bill to pay every member his salary, on the ground that it was a prorogation, and I say further that any member who got this money and wished for more and came back to get it was guilty of taking money under false pretenses. (Cheers.) We know what has happened in the United States. We know that the Globe, in order to induce its friends to come—they knew of course that my friends from the Pacific did not care for a thousand dollars—but they thought that the hon. members who were nearer Ottawa would be induced to come by a bribe, and the Globe to the eternal disgrace of that paper, insinuated that if hon. members came they would get their money. (Cheers.) I shall now make a few remarks in respect to the issue of the royal commission. I have spoken of the prorogation. I believe that it was unconstitutional. I believe that it was wise, or whether it was wise, or unwise, it was sanctioned by this parliament, and I know that parliament cannot, without dishonour, reverse their vote; and I believe I know that the house accepted that prorogation on the ground that the adjournment was in effect to be a prorogation, and that only the two Speakers should be in the house on the 13th of August. (Cheers.) As regards the legality of the royal commission, I believe that I need not speak so long on that subject. The motion of the hon. member for Lambton relieves me from that necessity. I will quote the evidence of the royal commission.

Mr. BLAKE—Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—I hear the member for South Bruce say “hear, hear.” Surely he ought not to touch, taste nor handle the unclean thing. (Laughter.) Surely he will not think that any good fruit will come from a vile stalk. Surely he won’t quote any evidence of the commission if he believes the evidence of that commission to be illegal. The hon. gentleman is on the horns of a dilemma. Either the evidence is legal or illegal. If it is legal, then the house can judge from the evidence, but if it is illegal, the house must discard it; and yet the hon. member for Lambton quoted this evidence, and every man who spoke on the opposite side of the house used that evidence; and it cannot be said, if that evidence is to be used against the government, that it is illegal or unconstitutional. (Cheers.) You have your money, and you take your choice. Either accept or discard it, and remain as you were before this evidence was taken. (Cheers.) Now it was alleged in the argument of an hon. gentleman opposite, with respect to this committee, that the governor-general had been snubbed. I tell the hon. gentleman, and I have the permission of the crown to state it, that in addition to the official announcement, there is a formal opinion given by the law officers of the crown.—those authorities whose opinion the hon. member for Bothwell looked so scornfully upon, but every one else so much respected—that the course taken by the governor-general both in respect to the prorogation and the issuance of the royal commission, was legal and constitutional.

Mr. BLAKE.—Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD.—Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help it if the hon. gentleman does not agree with the law officers of the crown. But I have still a further statement to make, and I think I may make it in the presence of my hon. friend the finance minister—that the course of the governor-general in respect to all these transactions had been finally settled and agreed upon by the whole imperial cabinet. (Cheers.) It is said, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the commission that by constitutional authority the crown cannot know what happens in the house of commons. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is one of the anachronisms which we see in the quotations of the hon. gentlemen opposite. They are two or three centuries behind the times. Did the matter remain with the house alone, or conclude with the house? No, the house itself sent information to the governor-general by the member for Shefford. In consequence of the resolution passed by the house, the member for Cardwell introduced a bill for the purpose of giving the committee power to administer oaths. We passed that bill through both houses, and it went to the crown, to the first branch of the legislature. Is it to be supposed that when we, the advisers of the crown, the advisers of the governor-general, asked him to come down here contrary to usual practice, contrary to the general universal practice, to come down before the end of the session to give his sanction to a measure; is it to be supposed that when we brought him down for that special purpose we were not charged by the legislature to convey to him why we asked him to give his assent? Then why, Mr. Speaker, was it to be supposed that the sovereign would give, as a matter of course, his assent to a measure passed by this parliament without a reason. Sir, we gave that reason. The advisers of the crown told the crown what the motion of the member for Shefford was. They told the crown what the proceedings before the house were, and that the culmination of their proceedings was that the act should be passed. That was the reason why the crown came down, that was the reason why the governor-general instead of at the end of the session came down in the middle. He was fully informed of the motion of the member for Shefford, and of all the proceedings on which the bill was based. But it has been said, sir, that this act was an obstruction of the action of parliament. Why sir, it was intended for the purpose of aiding parliament, but it was disallowed; but certainly by no act of mine as has been charged. It was even asserted somewhere that I had, or that the governor-general had, attempted in some way to influence the government in England to disallow the act. Well, sir, the paper before parliament shows with what scorn that statement can properly be met. No suggestion direct or indirect, went from the Canadian to the imperial government with respect to the disallowance or passage of that act. (Cheers.) I did not hesitate in my place in parliament to express my opinion that the passage of that act was beyond the powers of the Canadian parliament. I had formed, I may say, a very strong opinion on the point, but I did not express my opinion so strongly to this house as I really felt it, because I knew from the usual generosity of gentlemen opposite that they would at once have said, "Oh, of course, you throw obstacles in the way because you do not wish the bill to pass," and therefore, while I would have liked to state that we had not the power to pass the act, at the same time I placed great confidence in the opinion of the hon. member for Cardwell. I do not know whether the member for South Bruce expressed any opinion on the point, but if he did not, many other learned members did, and I paid great respect to their opinions. I did not therefore oppose, as otherwise I would have opposed, the passage of the bill, which I would certainly have done had I not been personally concerned. When it went up to the governor-general, as the papers will show, as I was bound to express my real opinion, I stated my doubt of its legality, but hoped his excellency would see his way to allow it instead of reserving it for the signification of her majesty's pleasure, and I gave my advice not only as first minister, but as minister of justice, that the act should be passed. The measure was passed and went home to England and, as the despatches show, the case was fully argued, so far as it could well be argued, and the strong impression of the representative of our sovereign at the time was, that I was wrong in my law, and that the hon. gentlemen who had supported the bill were right, and that the bill would become law. We know what the result was, and that after the consultations the bill was disallowed. It has been said by the hon. member for Bothwell, that it is out of the question that we should be governed by the law officers of the crown, but let me state to this house, Mr. Speaker, that the decision was not the decision merely of the law officers of the crown, but it was the decision of the British government. It was an order of the privy council, and there is not an order of the privy council passed in which the lord chancellor is not consulted before a decision is come to. But, sir, whether the commission was legal or not, and we will suppose for a moment that it was not, though it is a great stretch of supposition, would it not have been well for the hon. member for Shefford to have come before that commission? Would it not have been well for the hon. member, as a man really anxious to have justice done? Would it not have been well for the hon. member if desirous of the triumph of his party, not desirous of the defeat of a ministry, not desirous of a change of government, but really, truly, anxiously, and, as he said, painfully desirous of having justice done, to have come before the commission and have followed up the investigation from day to day? I think the house will say that the privileges of parliament were not endangered, and that he might safely have prosecuted the matter and have brought the offenders to justice, and that he could have done so without prejudice to his position as a member of parliament. Why then did the hon. gentleman not come? It did not suit his plans to come. The hon. gentleman's game was first to destroy the Pacific railway company under the charge of Sir Hugh Allan, and then to destroy the government, and not to have a real inquiry into the conduct of the administration. Besides, sir, and it is a consideration of some importance to the house, and one that ought to have great force in the country, I myself, and the other members of the government who were in this country, desired to give our explanation under oath. I went there, Mr. Speaker, and you know it was said in the newspapers that the commission would be a sham, and there would be no examination at all, and that the members of the government and other witnesses would shelter themselves under the plea that they need not criminate themselves. I would ask you, sir, and every hon member, whether every member of the government, when called before that commission, did not give full, clear and unreserved statements as regards all the transactions connected with the Pacific railway. (Cheers.) As I believe that that commission was issued in accordance with the law, because the crown as such had a perfect right to enquire into that matter, so at the same time I believe that in no way was it designed, and in no way did it in any way obstruct the action of parliament. Mr. Speaker, this house is not governed by that commission or the evidence, although the member for Lambton has quoted the evidence, and used it, and made it the basis of his motion. I say the house is not in any way bound by that commission. It is in no way checked or obstructed or prevented from instituting the most searching examination into the matter. As a matter of fact, I believe that when the member for Shefford made his charges here, there was a notice given in the senate for an inquiry, and there was no reason in the world why the senate should not have had an inquiry. They might have had a committee, and, as we have often seen it in England, the two branches of the legislature might have had concurrent committees sitting at the same time; and it might happen, as in England, that these committees might come to different conclusions. If a committee had been granted by the senate, would that have been a breach of the privileges of this house? Certainly not. Well then, sir, if it be not a breach of the privileges of parliament that the second and third branches of the legislature should have concurrent examinations into a certain charge, how can it be a breach of the privileges of the second and third chambers for the first branch of the legislature to go into the matter. (Cheers.) If the senate can discuss the matter, cannot the sovereign go into it? Sir, the answer is too obvious to admit of doubt, and it must be remembered the sovereign holds a two-fold position; that the sovereign is not only the first branch of the legislature, and as such has a right to inquire into such matters, but is also the head of the executive and is the executive. The crown governs the country; the crown chooses its own ministers, and this house has no control, and the senate has no control over the crown in this respect, except in deciding whether they have confidence in the ministers chosen. The crown, in order to be a reality and not a myth, must have the full and sole selection of the individual members to form the government, and it is then for parliament to say whether that selection is such as will command the confidence of parliament as well as enable them to carry on the affairs of the country. If that is constitutional law, and I think it is, what is the consequence? It is that the sovereign has the right to inquire into the conduct of its own officers. If an offence is committed, the crown has a right to inquire into it. If a charge is made the crown has the right to ascertain whether that charge is true. I will suppose the case of a minister charged with a crime amenable to common law. Could not the crown make inquiry into such a matter? The proposition is too absurd a thing to need an answer, for we know of many cases where the crown has made such inquiry. The case that is most applicable in principle to the present one is that of Lord Melville, and I will refer to that because it lays down certain principles to which I would invite the attention of the house. The case is especially applicable because the matter was first discussed in the house of commons; and it is said here that because the matter was first discussed in the house of commons it should end there, and no other tribunal should deal with it, and no other authority should intervene and prevent the house from concluding its inquiry. But there is no reason in the world why any independent authority should not pursue an independent inquiry, leaving to the house a full, unrestrained and unrestricted right of inquiry. In the case I have mentioned there had been great abuses in connection with the navy contracts in England during the Peninsular war, and there were allegations of enormous frauds, and a pledge was given by Mr. Pitt's government, of which Lord Melville was a member, that so soon as a peace was concluded, an inquiry should be entered into, as it was thought impossible that in the height of the war a proper inquiry could be made. I grant that it was a different administration that moved for a committee in the matter, but the motion was in consequence of the pledge given by Mr. Pitt, but when Lord Sidmouth asked for the committee it was opposed in the house of commons, on the ground that the crown could prosecute the inquiry. The navy board had full authority, and the admiralty had full authority, and it was urged that the crown as it appointed the judges so it should appoint commissioners to try the particular case. There was the responsibility, and this view was argued strongly. As anyone will see who reads it, the commission was only granted after the government had been asked whether they had got their commissioners, and after the house had been informed that the navy board and the government of the day asked for the commission, and the act to authorize the administration of oaths was passed because there was no power in the navy board to administer oaths. The commission was similar to this in all respects. On this the minister was tried, and on this a minister was acquitted, and the only difference between that case and this was that on that case a commission was asked for by the government, and in this the commission was issued by the government under the act.

Mr. WOOD.—Whenever there were commissions, special acts were passed, authorizing these commissions.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD.—Would the hon. gentleman tell me of any such commissions?

Mr. WOOD.—Yes, there was the act of 1843, and the act of St. Albans, and in 1852 a general act was passed relating to such matters. No single case could be found in which a royal commission was appointed to try corrupt parties at elections, except under a special act.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD.—The hon. gentleman cites certain acts relating to corrupt practices, but the hon. gentleman must see that his cases had no reference to this one, because those which he cited referred to corruption in boroughs, and the charge here is general corruption on the part of the government. It had been contended by the hon. member for Bothwell, who spoke at some length, that it was very surprising that the witnesses before the royal commission did not know anything, that they came up one after another, telegraph operators and others, and all stated that they did not know anything about the matter. Why were they called? The reason was plain, and the reason was known to the hon. member. It was because Mr. Huntington handed in the names of these witnesses to the committee. He handed in my name among the rest, and it was alleged that there was an arrangement about this as if the government had any control over that commission. The witnesses were called one after another and in the order shown on the list handed in by the hon. member for Shefford. Early in the session he handed in the list of witnesses. and they were all called in their sequence. I could not help it if a railway operator or a telegraph operator was called up and did not know anything about it. His name was there on the list, and in one case it was shown that M. Coursol, whose name was put on the list, met Mr. Huntington, and when he asked him why it had been done, that hon. gentleman said he did not know. It was the duty of the commissioners to call upon every man that hon. gentleman had placed on the list, whether they knew anything or knew nothing, and therefore the charge of the hon. gentleman that they were called up by arrangement was untrue, and it was altogether unworthy of the hon. gentleman. Witnesses were called up as they came on the list, and as they came on that list they came up to give their evidence. With respect to the composition of the commission, I have not much to say. It is beneath me to say much. (Cheers.) There is no man in Lower Canada who will not say that Judge Day, by his legal acquirements, was well fitted for the position, and when I tell you that the present chief justice of the superior court, Judge Meredith, has said that the greatest loss that the bench of Lower Canada ever had, was in Judge Day. I have said all that can be said. (Cheers.) Judge Day is a man above any charge of political bias. He has shown what he was on the bench; he has shown what he was as a politician; he has shown in the codification of the laws of Lower Canada what he was as a jurist. The hon. member for Shefford said that the other two judges were my creatures. He did not venture to attack Justice Day, but he attacked the other two. Now, with respect to Mr. Justice Polette, I may say that I have not seen him, nor have I had any communication with him for seventeen long years. For seventeen long years he had been obliterated out of memory. I knew him in my early days in parliament as a supporter of the Lafontaine-Morin coalition. From that time he departed from my vision until he was appointed on that commission. And why, sir, why was he appointed on that commission? I was resolved in consequence of the insult that had been heaped upon the committee in Montreal, that the commissioners must sit in Ottawa, where they could be protected from such insults, and, therefore, there was no chance of the charge being tried by a Lower Canada judge. I was anxious that there should be a Lower Canada judge on the commission. It was suggested by the Globe that no superior court judge ought to sit on the commission, as a cause might arise out of it yet which would have to be tried before them. I endeavoured, therefore, to carry out the suggestion. I thought it was a good one, and took Justice Day, who, as a retired judge, could by no possibility try any case which might arise. He said that he would be only too glad to do so, but as he was on very friendly personal relations with the Hon. Mr. Abbott, perhaps it might be thought not to be proper. He, however, consented to act. He also stated to me that at least one French Canadian judge should sit, as one of my colleagues, a French Canadian, was implicated. He thought over all the names of the judges of Lower Canada, and suggested to me the name of M. Justice Polette as a man of high standing, a man of great legal power, as worthy in all respects to take his seat on the commission. And it is said Mr. Justice Gowan was a creature of mine. How Mr. Justice Gowan ever came to be considered a creature of mine, I cannot say. He commenced life as a partner of Mr. Small, and was an extreme reformer. He was appointed by Mr. Baldwin on the representation of Mr. Small. I never did him a single favour that I know of. I did not appoint him a judge. He was appointed a judge before I was a member of parliament, his appointment being made in 1843, while I became a member of parliament in 1844. I afterwards became acquainted with Judge Gowan, and I found that he was a good lawyer. I may also say that I have received great advantage, and that the country has received great benefits from the services of Mr. Justice Gowan. There is but one judge of the superior court in Upper Canada whom I have not appointed or promoted, and that one judge, I am proud to say, on the best evidence, has declared in the strongest terms that in the evidence produced before the commission there is not one tittle of evidence against me. (Cheers.) It has been said that the commission was a partisan commission; but supposing I had committed any crime under the common law of the land, I must have been tried under a judge who was appointed or promoted by myself; and I believe that not one single month or day less punishment would have been given to me if I had been tried by any one of these judges whom I have been from my position instrumental in placing on the bench. With respect to the charges brought against the judges, they have assumed various phases. First we are told that the government had acted with these American gentlemen and had given up all the rights of Canada to a foreign corporation. We were told that we are recreant to our position as Canadians, to our position as members of parliament, and guardians of the rights of Canada, and that we had handed over the great Pacific railway to the Americans. When that broke down, the next charge was brought up. Hon. gentlemen opposite said, "We know you did not do that, but you have sold it," and then when that broke down they came to the last charge, and said: "Oh, you are guilty of spending a large sum of money at the elections." There are the three charges, and with your permission I shall deal with them seriatim. It has been attempted to show that the first was not a charge. I would ask the house if it was not so understood in Canada, if it was not so understood in England, if it had not rung through the country, that the government of Canada were so devoid of duty, so devoid of patriotism, that they sold the charter to the Americans? I must say that when this charge was first made, it roused me. I had thought that I had thwarted these men in every particular. I had thought that I had excluded them in every particular. I had thought that I had kept Jay Cooke & Co., and Scott & Co., and every company in any way connected with the Northern Pacific railway out of the Canadian Pacific railway. (Cheers.) Mr. Speaker, if I had not done so; if I had gone into that moderate system; if I had allowed the American railway system to go on and be completed, forever shutting out the opportunity for ours; if I had played the American game; if I had played the game of the hon. gentlemen opposite; if I had sold the railway; if I had sold the interests of Canada,—I would have got the plaudits of hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of now getting their stabs. (Cheers.) But it is because, from the first to the last, I was a true Canadian; because from the first to the last I stood by Canada; because from the first to the last, when they attempted to levy blackmail upon me, I put it down with a strong hand,—that is why the attack was made on the government; that is why the attack was made on me. (Loud cheers.) I have no hesitation in saying that this course, taken by the hon. member for Shefford, is governed behind the scenes by a foreign element. (Cheers.) I do not charge the hon. gentlemen by whom he is surrounded with being parties to this, but I do say that the course of the hon. member for Shefford is governed by a foreign element, and I can prove it. (Cheers.) And if a committee is granted to me, I will show that the hon. gentleman sits here by virtue of alien money and influence; and not only by virtue of alien influences, but alien railway influences. (Cheers.) I can prove it. I am informed, and verily believe, that I can prove it. (Cheers and laughter.) I have got evidence, and if a committee is given to me I can prove that the hon. gentleman was elected to his seat in this house by alien railway influences; and more than that, I can not only prove that he was elected by alien railway influences, but by alien railway influences not unconnected with the Northern Pacific railway. (Loud cheers.) Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to speak to the specific charges made against the government. Sir, before the last election took place, I knew what I had to face. I had a great, a strong and united opponent. I had showered upon my devoted head all kinds of opposition. I had been one of the high commissioners, and one of the signers of the treaty of Washington. It was said that I had betrayed the country, and the hon. gentlemen had described me in their speeches as a cross between Benedict Arnold and Judas Iscariot. But I met parliament, and by a calm explanation of my course I won the approval of the house. Still the opposition roared. I knew that I must meet with a strong opposition in my native province, from gentlemen of the opposite party. That province was the only province in the country that was not a gainer by the treaty, except as it was a gainer by the great gain which, I think, over-balanced everything—that of a lasting peace between England and the United States. (Cheers.) It gave to our children, and to our children's children, the assurance that we could enjoy our own comfort, that we could enjoy our own firesides, that we could sit under our own fig tree, without the possibility of the war-cloud hanging over us; and if I was guilty of being a party to that treaty, I shall be glad to have it recorded on my tombstone. (Loud cheers.) We yielded much, we gave up many things—I admit that. I told this house that we had yielded much—that we had given up many things. But still we see our country prosperous—still we see every interest growing (cheers), and now we know that by no hostile hand, by no unfriendly, warlike invasion, can the future be destroyed. (Cheers.) Yet, sir, I went out and submitted my shoulder to the smiter. I knew how much it would be held out that we had not got what we ought to have got; that we had got no reciprocity—that the wheat of the Western farmer was not exchanged on equal terms with the wheat of the Americans. But I had to meet that, and I met it, Mr. Speaker, like a man. (Cheers.) I had to meet much more. I had not only to be told—as I was told at every place that I went to—that I was a traitor and had sold this country. If Canada is never sold in the future by a greater traitor than myself, Canada will be a fortunate country. (Loud cheers.) But I was told also that I had not only sold Canada to the Yankees, but that I had sold Ontario to the other provinces. It was said that I had not only committed a great breach of international law, but had also given them more than their rights. On every question of constitutional law I have had the satisfaction of having the courts—well, not perhaps the courts, but of those men who make the courts—in my favour, and I have never made a constitutional or legal proposition in which I have not had the support of the legal advisers of the crown in England, and in which I have not been right, and the hon. gentlemen opposite have been wrong. But with respect to Nova Scotia, we are told, not only that my course was unconstitutional, but that we had given to Nova Scotia more than they had a right to have. Perhaps the hon. gentleman opposite would say they never said so. He had been in the habit of saying so. But the fact could be proved, that the hon. gentleman took the two grounds—first, that our action was unconstitutional, and second, that the action was unjust to Ontario. (Cheers.) Now I would ask you to speak to every member from Upper Canada, and ask if they did not find in every election that said of the government of Canada, and that I, as prime minister, had granted to Nova Scotia too much, and had thereby increased the taxation of the people of Ontario? I have had to tell the people of Ontario, in the first place, that Nova Scotia only got justice, and in the second, that the course taken was perfectly constitutional; and even if we had given Nova Scotia a little more than justice, it was well worth the outlay. (Cheers.)

Why, Mr. Speaker, what did we find at the time of the union? The minister of customs was the first man returned to the house in the elections, on strictly union principles. Consider the position we were in here. We were with a constitution just trembling in the balance, and yet we found one of the most important provinces recalcitrant, threatening independence, and opposing in every possible way the carrying out of confederation, under which we now live and flourish. Was I to deal with the question in a hesitating way? If we had given to Nova Scotia a little more than her rights, and even as it were a sop, I say it was a statesmanlike act. But, sir, there were no necessities of that kind. We did them simple justice; and I will venture to say that any member who will now sit down and read the discussions and negotiations between Canada and Nova Scotia, will feel that we did full and ample justice. I am no friend to doing half justice, but we did them no more than justice. What is the consequence? We see the people, irrespective of party; we see every man in Nova Scotia admiring the legislation of parliament introduced by the government, which has made Nova Scotia a part of the Dominion, instead of being a separate province, and has converted it into one of the most ardent friends of confederation among the whole of the different members of the Dominion. (Cheers.) If it shall happen, sir, as it may happen, that I receive a reverse, a condemnation of any particular act of mine, I may still appeal, and I do appeal, to the members for Nova Scotia, who, when their best interests were assailed, and they were brought perforce, fas aut nefas, into confederation, they still got fair treatment, got full justice, at our hands; and I hope to live in the hearts of the Nova Scotians. (Cheers.) While that was satisfactory to me, I think it was not satisfactory to my friends in Ontario. Every man who supported me was attacked at the polls with respect to our action on the Washington treaty, and because it was said we had given too much to help the Nova Scotians. So with British Columbia. Let me read some of the resolutions with reference to the Pacific railway and British Columbia. Do you suppose, does any man suppose, we could have British Columbia within the Dominion without a railway? There must not only be a union on paper, but a union in fact. Those hon. members of the opposition, by every act that they could, in every way that they could, opposed the practical union of British Columbia with Canada. (Cheers.) They voted against it, they said it was most outrageous—the plan, the idea of a railway, was outrageous. (Opposition cries of “hear.”) That is the language used by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will presently quote terms used. Now let us look at some of the motions made. The government moved a motion to carry out a measure which is now the law. It was moved in amendment “that the proposed engagement respecting the Pacific railway would, in the opinion of the house, press too heavily on the resources of Canada to carry out.” That motion was defeated. (Ministerial cheers.) Then it was moved, “that in view of the arrangement entered into with British Columbia at the time of confederation, and the large expenditures necessary for canal improvements and other purposes within the Dominion, this house is not justified in imposing on the people the enormous burden of taxation required to construct within ten years a railway to the Pacific, as proposed by the resolution submitted to this house.” (Ministerial cheers.) I say I might read you a series of resolutions, all made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and voted for by them, showing that in their opinion we had been overtaxing the resources of the people of Canada. I am now told by the hon. gentlemen opposite, that, although they opposed that arrangement with British Columbia, they think they are bound to it now. I am told that they say, “True, we made an arrangement with British Columbia which was improvident, extravagant and ruinous, and which could never be carried out. Yet, being made, we will carry it out.” I don’t exactly see the logic of that. If it be ruinous, extravagant and impossible, I really don’t see how it can be carried out now. (Cheers.) But, Mr. Speaker, I don’t believe the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite is in favour of that. (Loud cheers.) I know it is opposed to that. (Renewed cheers.) I know, if this government goes out of office, and another government comes into power, if it be composed of hon. gentlemen opposite, that it will oppose our policy in this question. (Ministerial cheers.) Hon. gentlemen opposite dare not deny that the Globe newspaper announces and directs their policy. We passed a bill the session before last: we granted a charter for the building of the road, and it was settled and determined that the Pacific railway should be built, and we were to build it on our own territory, and not allow the Yankees to come in and assist in building the road, nor even the friends of the hon. member for Vancouver. Yet, what was the announcement of the organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite? After the legislation of 1872, after we had accepted the arrangement with British Columbia, after we had brought them into the Dominion on the pledge of the faith of the government and the country that there would be a Pacific railway within ten years, after we had made that promise, with the solemn sanction of the country, what were the remarks of the Globe, the exponent of the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite! The right hon. gentleman then read an extract from an article, published in the Globe during 1873, wherein the Pacific railway scheme was declared to be financially ruinous, and politically unpatriotic;—a scheme which could only be accomplished within ten years at an outlay which would cripple Canadian resources, and lock up the most valuable part of our public domains. The right hon. gentleman continued:—Now, Mr. Speaker, you see what is to happen if Canada builds this Canadian Pacific railway. All our resources are to be crippled by this, the most ruinous and most unpatriotic scheme ever invented, and this cry I had to meet at the hustings. I have gone on from one stage to another. I have shown you how I met the cries at the hustings—that I bartered away Canadian rights in the Washington treaty; that I had granted too much to Nova Scotia; that I had been guilty of granting a constitution to a few half-breeds in the North-West country, and had given them infinitely more than they had a right to expect; that, as regards British Columbia, I would throw away the resources of Canada upon the construction of the Pacific railway, and that I had sold Ontario. (Ironical cheers from the opposition.) Mind you, Ontario considers itself the richest province—and no doubt it is—and that any additional charge placed in the public treasury presses unfavourably on them, because they pay more in proportion to their wealth than the other provinces of the Dominion. I know they don't do so, but it has been urged upon them that they do do so. Then, again, we had to meet the continued opposition of the local government of Ontario. I will give the hon. gentlemen proofs in writing, so that they will not be able to deny the fact—proof that though that local government had pledged itself in the most formal manner to be neutral in the contest, that they, by every act in their power, and by every influence, direct and indirect, that they possessed, worked against the Canadian government. That is the charge, and I can prove it. (Ministerial cheers.) We know that influences of every kind would be used, and were used, which can be proved; or, as the hon. member from Shefford would say, "I am credibly informed, and can prove," (laughter); and we believed that the future of Canada much depends upon the continuing in power of a government that has for its one single aim and object the maintenance of the connection between Canada and the British empire, and the promotion of the development of the Dominion itself. (Cheers.) We have been met at the polls with sectional cries. If the opposition could raise a religious cry, it was done. The New Brunswick school question was brought up, and they got up the cry that we had given too much to Nova Scotia, and those cries were made to ring at the polls in Western Canada. The cry that we had given too much to British Columbia was hammered into us at every public meeting in the west, and I say distinctly, and I repeat it again, that we had the power, influence, and the weight of the Ontario government against us, contrary to the distinct pledge that that government would be neutral. (Cheers.) Well, sir, I will state now what occurred with respect to the Pacific railway. I was at Washington, bartering my country, as some of the hon. gentlemen say—(laughter)—attending, at all events, to the Washington treaty, when the resolutions were carried which happily I say for Canada brought British Columbia into the union of the British North American provinces. (Cheers.) The proposition included the Pacific railway, for British Columbia would not have come in, unless the terms of union had included a railway. Notwithstanding great opposition, the resolutions were carried by my late honoured and lamented colleague, but he only carried them by promising to introduce resolutions by which the railway would be built, not by the government directly, but by private capital, aided by government grants. I would not, if I had been here, have willingly assented to that proposition, but though I was not here, yet I am responsible for that act, and I do accept it as perhaps the best proposition to be had; otherwise, perhaps, the union would not have been consummated. The resolutions declared that the railway should be built by a railway company, assisted by government grants of land and money. The hon. member for Napierville, however, moved a resolution setting forth that the house did not believe that private capital could be obtained sufficient for the purpose. The whole of the resolutions moved by hon. gentlemen opposite were more for the purpose of defeating the construction of the Pacific railway; and when Sir George Cartier produced his resolutions, and was about to carry them as prepared, he had to give way to the desire of the house, because even those who usually supported the government were alarmed by the cry which had been raised by gentlemen opposite. Thus, if the motion of the hon. member for Napierville had been adopted, and Canada was unable to get a company to build the railway, the bargain with British Columbia would fall to the ground and be only waste paper, and British Columbia would sit out shivering in the cold, forever, without a railway. The policy indicated by that resolution of the hon. member for Napierville has been carried out ever since. In March, long after the legislation had taken place, by which parliament declared that there should be a Pacific railway built in some way or other, we find the Globe urging its friends to still further oppose that scheme; and, sir, we have had arraigned against us the opposition of those who usually ally themselves against the government, supported by those gentlemen of the opposition many of whom owe their election to sectional cries. (Cheers.) We have met them, and it is said that we have met them with money. I believe that the gentlemen opposite spent two pounds to our one. (Opposition cries of "no, no.") I challenge the hon. gentlemen to have a committee on this subject. Let us have a committee. (Ministerial cheers.) I read the speech of the hon. member for South Bruce at London, and he suggested the appointment of a statutory committee. In God's name, let us have it! Let us have a committee of three, to go from county to county, from constituency to constituency, and let them sift these matters to the bottom, and I tell you on my honour as a man, that I believe I can prove that there are more who owe their elections to money on that side of the house than on this. (Loud ministerial cheers. If I be challenged, I can go into detail. I can show, and I can prove it, that many members owe their election to money, and to money alone. I challenge the hon. gentlemen to agree to the appointment of a committee, a statutory committee, as suggested by the hon. member for South Bruce. Let us put the names of the judges of all the provinces into a bag, and draw out three names, who shall form the committee. (Cheers.) As I stated in my evidence—and I hope my evidence has been carefully read by every member of this house—and I say here, that I tried to be as full and frank as I could well be. I could not help it if I was not subjected to a rigid cross-examination. I was exceedingly anxious that the hon. member for Shefford should be there to cross-examine me—(cheers)—and I would willingly have answered his questions. I have little more to say than I said then. Sir, there was no sale to Sir Hugh Allan of any contract whatever. (Cheers.) Consider for one moment, Mr. Speaker, how the case stood. Parliament had passed two acts, one for Upper Canada and one for Lower Canada, and some two or three subsidiary acts respecting branch lines. But we will leave these out of the question, and will consider that there were two acts passed—one for a company having its centre in Montreal, and the other in Toronto. Now, sir, although there were Ontario gentlemen connected with the Canada Pacific company, and although there were Quebec gentlemen connected with the Interoceanic company, yet they were really acts promoted by men who have Ontario and Quebec interests only, and every one saw that they were essentially sectional. Before parliament met, and before either act was passed, the cry was got up that the Northern Pacific people were desirous of obtaining the control of our railway. At the first, Mr. Speaker, when the first interview took place between the government and these gentlemen, I was very glad to see them. We had passed in 1871 the act that British Columbia should be a portion of the Dominion, and we had passed a resolution by which we were to build the railway in ten years. It was understood, then, sir, that the whole matter should stand over until the ensuing session, and that in the meantime the government should go on with the survey and be ready in 1872 with the plans. We got through the session of 1872 and we commenced, in order to keep faith with the British Columbians, the survey, and I think they will admit, and everyone must admit, that the greatest energy and the greatest zeal have been exhibited in the survey, and that within two years there has never been so much work so satisfactorily done as in this railway survey by Mr. Sanford Fleming. (Cheers.) The survey was going on, and in midsummer and in the fall all the members of the government were scattered looking after their several affairs, taking their little holidays, and God knows the public men of this country have little enough holiday. They were all scattered except Sir Francis Hincks and myself when Mr. Waddington called on me. I had known the gentleman before, and I much respected him. He said to me that there were some American gentlemen to see us about the railway. I said to him in my way, "What a fool you were to bring them here. We can do nothing with them." He was very much distressed, and said to me. "But you will not refuse to see them." I said certainly not. The gentlemen then came, and Sir Francis Hincks and I met them, and we talked pleasantly, and I said to them that I was glad to see that American capital was looking for investment in Canadian enterprises, but that it was altogether premature as we could not then take any offers or suggestions, or take any action till after we had met parliament. One of them remarked that they had evidently been brought on a wild-goose errand, and they then went away. This first brought to my mind very strongly the necessity for looking out for our railway. Parliament had tied down our hands, and the railway could only be built by a company, and there were no other means of carrying out the pledge with British Columbia, and I therefore immediately addressed myself to the matter. And what did I do? I spoke to all that I could, as I have no doubt my colleagues did, and endeavoured to arouse Canadians in the enterprise. I went to Toronto and saw Messrs. Macpherson, Gzowski, Col. Cumberland, Mr. Howland and his son, and Gooderham & Worts, and in fact every one, and endeavoured to induce them to enter into the great enterprise. I told them as Sir Francis Hincks told Sir Hugh Allan, that by law there was no other way of building the road but by a company, and that they ought to get up a grand company, get a charter and go to England for any capital they needed. As I went to Toronto, Sir Francis Hincks went accidentally to Montreal, and told Sir Hugh about the American gentlemen who had called on us, and the fault I found with my friend Sir Francis, and which I ventured to tell him when he was a member of the government was, that while merely attempting to stimulate Sir Hugh to go into the work, he had named to him that he had better put himself in communication with the American capitalists. That was the act of Sir Francis Hincks. That was his concern, and I would not at all object to American capital, or capital from England, or anywhere else, but I told Sir Francis on his return that he had been premature in this, that we ought to have kept to a great Canadian company before any offer or intimation that Americans might come in was made. Then Sir Hugh, acting on the hint given by Sir Francis, and it was no more than a hint—it was in no way a government action—communicated with the Americans, and we had a visit from a number of Americans with Sir Hugh; and Mr. Speaker, I being spokesman on both occasions, gave them precisely the same answer that they were premature; that we were very glad to see them, but we could make no arrangement until parliament met. I said we would be very glad however to hear any proposition, and asked them whether they had any to make. Sir Hugh asked in return whether we were in a position to entertain a proposition; and on our replying in the negative, he rejoined that he then had no proposition to make. And these were all the communications between the Canadian government and these gentlemen. (Cheers.) This statement cannot be controverted, and will not be. In the meantime a sectional jealousy had arisen, instead of, as I hoped, a joint action between the capitalists of Montreal and Toronto, and instead of, as I had hoped, there being a rush and anxiety among our moneyed men in the different parts of Canada to form one great company, for the work required united exertion, there was a jealousy fanned from some quarter, which we know now, and this jealousy prevented the two great bodies of capitalists, who ought to have built the road, from joining, and all our hopes were scattered; and a feeling arose in Toronto first that if the Montreal interest got the preponderance Toronto trade would get the go-by, and second, that Sir Hugh Allan and the Montreal interest were joined with the Americans. That feeling grew and I am not now in a position to state, after reading the evidence and after reading the letters of Sir Hugh Allan and those published by Mr. McMullen, I am not now in a position to state that that jealousy in Toronto was ill founded. I am not in a position to state that they had not some ground of which we knew nothing for believing that the Montreal party were in communication with the Americans. I am not now in a position to state that the people of Toronto and the Inter-oceanic had not great cause for suspicion and jealousy, whether that suspicion was well or ill founded; but before parliament met, as I have sworn, and as Mr. Abbott has sworn, and as every member of the house knows, the feeling against the introduction of American capital was so great that by no possibility could it be allowed entrance. We felt, Mr. Speaker, and every member knew it, that it was necessary that every American element must be eliminated from the acts, or they could not pass—(cheers)—and I appeal to hon. gentlemen who were then in the house if they do not know, as a matter of fact, that it was understood on all sides that the American element was eliminated. I understood it so; the government understood it so; and the house understood it so, and Mr. Abbott, who undertook the management of the bill of the Montreal company through this house, made it a special understanding with Sir Hugh Allan that it should be so before he promoted the bill, and so it was by universal consent. I know, Mr. Speaker, that it will be said, and I may as well speak of it now, that Sir Hugh Allan's letters show that he still kept up his connection with the Americans. I know it, and I painfully know it, that Sir Hugh Allan behaved badly and acted disingenuously towards the men with whom he was originally connected. I say that when he found that Americans were not to be admitted he ought to have written to them, and informed them that though he had made a contract with them, still so strong a feeling existed in Canada that he must at once and forever sever his connection with them. Instead of doing so, however, he carried on a correspondence with them, a private correspondence, which he has sworn no one else saw, and which he has sworn that not even his colleagues in the Canada Pacific company knew of, not even Mr. Abbott, his confidential adviser. He says he conducted it as his own personal affair, believing and hoping that in the end the people of Canada would come to a different view, and allow American capital to be used. He has sworn that, and we never knew that he was carrying on communications with the Americans. Mr. Abbott never knew it and the Canada Pacific company have declared that there was no connection between them and the Americans, but I have heard it said, I think, by the member for Chateauguay, is it possible that the government would give a contract to a man who had behaved so disingenuously, and after this want of ingenuousness had been shown to the Prime Minister, by the exhibition of the correspondence? Sir, let me say a word to you about that. After the Act passed and we were working with all our might to form a good company and a strong one, long after, Mr. Speaker, as it appears in the correspondence between Sir Hugh Allan and the Americans, Mr. McMullen came to my office in order to levy blackmail. (Cheers.) He did not show me the correspondence, but he flourished certain receipts and drafts which Sir Hugh Allan had drawn at New York. There was nothing, however, in that because he had told us he had gone into that association, and we knew that he had communication with the Americans, and there was nothing extraordinary in my seeing that these gentlemen had subscribed a certain sum of money for preliminary expenses, and I have never known a company, railway or otherwise, without preliminary expenses being provided for by the promoters. I told Mr. McMullen therefore, that it was his matter, and that he must go and see Sir Hugh. I heard no more about the matter until late in January or February, after we had formed the company, after a correspondence with every province of the Dominion, after having tried to excite and having successfully excited the capitalists of the different provinces to subscribe after we had got every thing prepared, after I had drafted the charter and the great seal only required to be affixed, and just when the charter was about to be launched, and the company to build the road was about to be made a certainty, then Mr. C. M. Smith, Mr. Hurlburt and Mr. McMullen walked into my office. I do not say that Mr. Smith or Mr. Hurlburt came to levy blackmail. I do not think they did, for they looked respectable gentlemen, and spoke and behaved as such. They told me Sir Hugh Allan had behaved very badly, and they read a good deal of the correspondence which has been published, and I told them then, "Gentlemen, if your statement is true, Sir Hugh Allan has behaved badly towards you, but the matter is your own, and Sir Hugh is no doubt able to meet you." They spoke of the seizing of his ships and bringing actions against him both in the United States and Canada, when I repeated to them that they had their own proper remedy, and added that Sir Hugh had not the slightest power to give them the contract. (Cheers.) I told them that he ought to have broken off his connection with them long ago, and that if he had kept them in the dark they must take their own remedy against him. We were then asked how could we admit Sir Hugh into the contract. Mr. Speaker, we had already admitted him. The contract was made. Every province had been given its directors. The charter had been drawn, and only awaited the signature of the governor-general; and more than all this, the correspondence, whatever may be said of the conduct of Sir Hugh Allan towards the Americans, proved the existence of hostility between them, and showed that if Sir Hugh were one of the company who received the contract we should keep the Americans out altogether. I had to get that contract let. I had to get a sufficient number of the capitalists of Canada who would take up this subject, and Sir Hugh Allan was the first. He is our greatest capitalist. He was the first man who went into it, and these gentlemen, Mr. McMullen and the rest, proved to me that Sir Hugh Allan had cut the cord of connection, had nothing to do with the Americans, or with Jay Cooke & Co., and that they were resolved to follow him to the death as they have done. (Hear, hear.) This, then is the narrative, so far, of our connection with the Pacific railway. My evidence states that shortly before the elections I went to Toronto, and Sir George Cartier went to Montreal. I do not wish hon. gentlemen to suppose for one single instant that I would desire to shelter myself or my living colleagues by throwing the blame on my dead colleague. (Cheers.) Whatever Sir George Cartier has done I will assume the responsibility of. (Hear, hear.) Whatever Sir George Cartier has done I must accept as being the honest expression of an individual minister; but, sir, I do not admit, and I will not admit, and it is not safe for hon. gentlemen opposite to admit, that any one minister can bind a ministry. (Cheers.) I went to Toronto in order to descend to the stern contest that was forced upon me by the course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, to meet the arguments that were going to be used against me, the sectional questions that were raised against me, the numerous charges which were made against me, and which I had always found operating against me. When I went to Ontario for that purpose, and to meet these charges, it was not for the first time. As long as I have been in parliament I have been charged by hon. gentlemen opposite with selling Upper Canada, with sacrificing the best interests of Upper Canada, with selling myself to French domination and Catholic influences and Lower Canadian interests. I had refuted these charges repeatedly, and had convinced the majority in Upper Canada that I held then as I do now the principle of union between Upper and Lower Canada, and that the only way by which that union could be firmly established was by ignoring sectional questions and religious differences. (Cheers.) These cries are still raised. You will hear them before many days in this house, and you will hear them throughout the country whenever it pleases hon. gentlemen opposite to raise them; but as my past history has shown, so my future history will prove that whatever party political exigency may be, I have never, and shall never give up the great principle of keeping intact the union of Upper and Lower Canada by a give and take principle, by a reciprocity of feeling and by surrendering our own religious and political prejudices for the sake of union. I went to the West to do what I could during the elections, in fighting the battle of the party and the government. I had simply said to Sir George Cartier that I should have a very hard fight in Upper Canada, as I had the government of Ontario against me, and I wished him to help me as far as he could. I went to Toronto, and I tried all I could before the elections took place to procure an amalgamation of the two companies. It was of vital importance, in a party point of view, laying aside the patriotic view, to have a company to build the road, composed of the Montrealers and the Toronto men, so that I could have gone to the country and said, "Here is a great enterprise. We have formed a great company. We are carrying out a great scheme. We are forming a great country." I spared no pains to procure an amalgamation; Senator Macpherson, and any one in Toronto connected with the enterprise, will tell you how hard, how earnestly, in season and out of season, I worked to procure that amalgamation. I failed. I thought I had succeeded two or three times. I abandoned my own constituency; I might have been elected by acclamation, or at all events by a very large majority, but instead of attending to my election, I went up to Toronto to attempt to bring about an amalgamation between the two companies. Then they got up a story about me, according to the habit of the opposition, that I considered my constituency a pocket borough, and thought I could afford to pass it by. I thought at one time I had succeeded in procuring an amalgamation, and Mr. Abbott came up to Toronto in response to a telegram from me. We had an interview with Mr. Macpherson, and almost succeeded in coming to an agreement. The only question was whether there should be seven and six or five and four directors from Ontario and Quebec. The arrangement was so near that I was satisfied when I left Toronto that the amalgamation was complete. I found, however, that that was not the case, and in the middle of my election, on the 25th, I think, of July, I telegraphed to Mr. Macpherson to come down, and he came down to Kingston and saw me and then I sent that telegram which has been published in the papers, and which was the only arrangement as regards the granting of the charter so far as the government was concerned, so far as I was concerned. (Hear, hear.) That telegram which was sent on the 26th July was sent by me to Sir Hugh Allan, after seeing Mr. Macpherson, and with the knowledge of Mr. Macpherson. Now what does that say? I was obliged reluctantly to give up the hope of having an amalgamation before the elections. These little jealousies, these little personal ambitions and the jostling between seventeen and thirteen members on the board had come in the way, and I could not carry out the arrangement I had hoped to complete. I could not spare the time. I was in great danger of losing my election by throwing myself away on this great Pacific railway. I actually came down to Kingston only on the day of my nomination, trusting to the kindness of my old friends in Kingston. Well, sir, what was the telegram which I sent? It said: "I have seen Mr. Macpherson,"—he was in the room when I wrote it. "I have seen Mr. Macpherson. He has no personal ambition, but he cannot give up the rights of Upper Canada. I authorise you to state that any influence the government may have in the event of amalgamation, shall be given to Sir Hugh Allan. The thing must stand over till after the elections. The two gentlemen, Mr. Macpherson and Sir Hugh Allan, will meet in Ottawa and form an amalgamation." That was the proposition which I made, and just think, sir, what was involved, think how much I was snubbing, which is a word which has been used by the Globe lately, how much I was injuring and prejudicing the interest of my colleague in Montreal, Sir George Cartier. Sir Hugh Allan did not care so much for the Pacific railway, and Sir George Cartier did not care so much for Sir Hugh Allan. It was not Sir Hugh Allan or the Pacific railway that he cared so much about; but Sir Hugh Allan had made himself the representative man of Lower Canada with respect to the Northern Colonization Road, the North Shore Road, and the Ottawa and Toronto Road, so that the members from Lower Canada would have stood by Sir Hugh Allan even to the risk of losing all the elections, because their Montreal interests would be so much affected if Sir Hugh Allan were not sustained with regard to the Pacific railway. But with respect to the other railways, my hon. friend from Hochelaga and other gentlemen can say that if there had been accord between Sir Hugh Allan and the French members of Lower Canada from the Montreal district, there would have been a great peril of the Lower Canadian members from that district deserting Sir George Cartier, and supporting Sir Hugh Allan in carrying out the Northern Colonization road. I was standing by Sir George Cartier, who was most improperly charged with being so much attached to the Grand Trunk railway that he would not do justice to the other roads. I will ask my friends from Lower Canada if Sir George Cartier's connection with the railway had anything to do with the results of the elections. His prospects were connected with the local roads alone. In order to prove to you how true a man Sir George Cartier was, how perfectly unselfish he was, I may state that he held back on my account. When he said, "I wish to be elected on my own merits, and on my own services, and not on account of the Colonization or any other road," (cheers) and when by a word he could have put an end to the cry of interest, he felt that it was a sectional feeling between Upper and Lower Canada, and that if he pronounced in favour of any railway in Lower Canada, he would injure me in Upper Canada, and he sacrificed himself for my sake in Lower Canada, because he thought that any pronouncements in favour of Sir Hugh Allan, might injure me and my friends in the western elections. (Cheers.) I had only one thing to do and that was to return to him the confidence and trust he had reposed in me. I said, "Don't mind me. Fight your own battles. You must make your own arrangements with your own friends in respect to the railways," and it was not until he had that communication with me that he said he would help the Northern Colonization road. It was not because Sir George Cartier had any personal objects to gain, it was not because he was connected with the Grand Trunk Railway, but it was purely from a desire to save me from any possible difficulty in Upper Canada that he held back, and I have here now, when he is dead, the proud opportunity of stating that even in the last moment he was actuated by no selfish feeling, by no desire to promote his own interests, but that he only thought of his colleague, of his comrade of twenty years. He only thought by appearing to promote a national interest in Lower Canada he might hurt me in Upper Canada, and he threw away all his chances, all his hopes, every thing like a certainty or a reasonable hope of success, for the purpose of standing by me, and I am proud and happy now to pay this tribute to his memory. (Cheers.) Well, sir, on the 26th of July I sent that telegram, and that was the only bargain. No man can make a bargain with the government, except by an order in council, or by the action of the first minister, recognised and accepted by his colleagues. Any act of a first minister, until it is disavowed, is considered equal to a minute of council, equal to an act of the government. That telegram of mine of the 26th of July was an act of the government. My colleagues have not repudiated it; they have accepted it, and it was a fair arrangement as we could not get the amalgamation. As we could not succeed in going to the country with a perfect scheme for building the Pacific railway, what else was left to us but to keep the amalgamation of these great capitalists open till after the elections, and then call them together, and the only word of preference for Montreal over Toronto was simply my expression that any influence the government might have in case of amalgamation, in the case of the two companies joining and electing a board of directors, would be fairly used in favour of Sir Hugh Allan for the presidency. I think that was due to Sir Hugh Allan, and after all it was no great affair. Everybody knows that the president of a company is no more than the junior member of the board of directors. It depends altogether upon the personal weight of the man. We have seen boards where the president governed the board; others where the president was a mere figure head, and others again where the junior member governed the company. It depends entirely upon the personal figure and authority of the man. Well, sir, I made that promise, but I wish the house to remember that at the time of that telegram, in which I simply stated that as we could not form a company before the elections, we would form one afterwards out of the two, and would do what we could to make Sir Hugh Allan president. At that time there had been not one single word said about money—(cheers)—and there never was one said, as far as I was concerned, between Sir Hugh Allan and me. (Hear, hear.) I was fighting the battle in Western Canada. I was getting subscriptions, as I have no doubt the hon. member for Lambton was getting subscriptions, and if he denies it I will be able to prove it. (Cheers.) I state in my place that I will be able to prove it. (Cheers.) I was doing what I could for the purpose of getting money to help the elections, and I was met, not only by individual exertions, but by the whole force, power and influence, legitimate and illegitimate of the Ontario government. I have no hesitation in saying that in all expenditure, we were met by two dollars to one. (Hear, hear.) I have read with some amusement the attacks that have been made upon the government, because a member of the government was a party to this fund. If we had had the same means possessed by hon. gentlemen opposite; if we had spies; if we had thieves; if we had men who went to your desk, picked your lock, and stole your note books, we would have much stronger evidence than hon. gentlemen think they have now. (Cheers.) We were fighting an uneven battle. We were simply subscribing as gentlemen, while they were stealing as burglars. (Cheers.) We may trace it out as a conspiracy throughout. I use the word conspiracy advisedly, and I will use the word out of the house as well as in the house. (Cheers.) The hon. member for Shefford said that he had obtained certain documents. He attempted to read them to this house, not much I think to his credit, and certainly contrary to the sense of the house and of the country. Now how did he get these documents. We had Mr. George W. McMullen, who was the American agent of these gentlemen. He had carried on this correspondence with Sir Hugh Allan, and when he came to me in December and tried to levy black mail on me (hear, hear,) I told him to go to —, well I did not use any improper language, but I told him to step out of my office (laughter and cheers,) and he went to the hon. gentlemen opposite. (Cheers.) This is no mere hypothesis of mine. Sir Hugh Allan had promised to pay this man $17,000 for these papers, and although he had the money almost in his hand, the hon. gentleman gave him something more. (Cheers.) The hon. gentleman cannot deny that he did.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—I do deny it. (Opposition cheers.) The statement is without foundation.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—If there is one person in the world whom the hon. member for Shefford has as a friend, it is the editor and proprietor of the Montreal Herald (hear, hear), I think he takes him to his bosom; I think they sleep together. I think they have but one thought. He is his guide, philosopher, and friend, and when we have the announcement from the Montreal Herald, of May the 22nd, 1873, I think we must accept it. “No one can suppose that such a plot could have been laid bare without great labour and large ex penditure" (cheers), again, the Herald says, speaking of Mr. Huntington,—“But for the courage with which he assumed it, as well as for the pains and expenditure which it has cost him to expose the mystery, he is entitled to the warmest gratitude.” (Cheers on both sides of the house.) I judge from the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite that the hon. member for Shefford has their thanks; but that is an admission that he made the expenditure. (Oh! oh! and cheers.) This man bought Mr. McMullen. It is admitted by the Montreal Herald that he bought him. (No! no! and hear, hear.)

HON. MR. HUNTINGTON—I have already stated in the house that the charges were not founded on any information from Mr. McMullen, and that the statements which have appeared were false. I never got any information. I never got any information from McMullen till long after I made the charges. I never paid nor promised him a cent, and the statement of the hon. gentleman is utterly without foundation. (Opposition cheers.) The statement also that he made a few minutes ago that I have been influenced here by foreign gold, and that foreign gold had been used in my election, is an utterly unfounded statement, false in every particular; and I challenge the hon. gentleman to the combat, and dare him on his responsibility to take the committee. (Mr. Huntington was proceeding, when cries of “Order!” were raised on the government benches, answered by opposition cheers. The hon. gentleman went on speaking in the midst of an uproar which rendered his remarks perfectly inaudible). On order being restored,

Sir JOHN MACDONALD proceeded. There, sir, is the very evidence that I have hit the spot; that I have hit him on a sore point. (Cheers and No! no!) I have told the hon. gentleman that I am willing to have a committee to inquire into the whole matter, including the case of the hon. gentleman.

HON. MR. HUNTINGTON—Oh! You can back out as you will.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—I am not backing out, but the hon. gentleman cannot expect to have it all as he likes. I'll read another extract. “Mr. Huntington said that the charter was obtained in the session of 1872, long after the men who furnished the money to him (Sir Hugh Allan) were repudiated, and made arrangements with him (Mr. Huntington) to bring the charges against the government.” (Cheers.)

HON. MR. HUNTINGTON rose to a question of order. The report of my speech is entirely without foundation. (Cries of order, order.) That is a question of fact, and the hon. gentleman can correct it afterwards.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—I heard it myself. (Cries from government benches, “We all heard it.”) Perhaps the hon. gentleman will deny that he said Jay Cooke would not have him in his office without a witness.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—That is another falsehood of the Ottawa Times. That paper, which is inspired by hon. gentlemen opposite, deliberately falsified my speech from the beginning to the end. I refused to disgrace myself by noticing the malignant statement of the dastard sheet. What I said was that I had not seen Jay Cooke for four years; that I went to a prominent promoter of the Northern Pacific railway (hear, hear), with the view of conversing with him, and found that they were the allies of the hon. gentlemen opposite, because they would not even talk to me without people being present. (Hear, hear.)

The SPEAKER—I must call the hon. member to order. I hope this interruption will cease. The hon. member knows what the rules of debate are as well as any one else in the house, and this plan of interruption can only lead to unseemly confusion in the house. The hon. gentleman will ask his opportunity from the house. I am sure it will be given to him, and he can then make his denial on the question of fact.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—I wish to invite the attention of every hon. member of this house who is an honest and candid man, to the statement I am making. There could be no amalgamation before the elections. In my telegram of the 26th of July I stated that the question must stand over until after the elections; that the two companies would stand on perfectly equal footing, and that the arrangements which had been made between Mr. Macpherson and Mr. Abbott should be the guiding line. That arrangement was that Upper Canada should have seven, Lower Canada six, and each of the other provinces one director on the board. Not by any chance or possibility could Sir Hugh Allan by his large capital, or the influence created by that capital, give undue influence on the board for Lower Canada or for himself over my own province. On the 30th of July I received a letter from Sir Hugh Allan, Sir Geo. Cartier being sick, stating that he had made certain arrangements with Sir George, and it was a bad arrangement, for it was something like this, that if there should not be an amalgamation he thought that Sir Hugh Allan's company ought to get the charter. I received that message in the middle of my election contest, and I said to myself it is not of much consequence whether one company or the other gets the charter if they unite, but it will kill me, it will kill us if the Montreal company without amalgamation receives it. However, I telegraphed back at once that I would not agree to the arrangement, and I would go down to Montreal that night. Yes, Mr. Speaker, in the midst of a severe election contest, for I was elected only by 130, whereas at the previous election I had a majority of 300, I said I would run down to Montreal on this matter. I telegraphed to Sir Geo. Cartier that I would not consent to the arrangement, and that my telegram of the 26th of July, 1872, would be the decision of the government, and the government would be bound thereby, and would be governed by nothing else. I wish it to be clearly understood, beyond the possibility of doubt, that the Canadian government had agreed that since it could not obtain an amalgamation of the two companies before the elections they would try to get an amalgamation after the elections, and in such an amalgamation they would do what was fair, in order to get Sir Hugh Allan made president of the amalgamated company. (Cheers.) I say that that arrangement made by Sir George Cartier was set aside, and why? Because it would have killed me in Upper Canada. I telegraphed that even at the risk of my election I would go down to Montreal and put an end to it, and Sir George Cartier, when he got my message, saw what an absurd proposition it was, and there was an end to it, and Sir Hugh Allan telegraphed back that the bargain was ended. At that time there had not been one single word said about money subscriptions. Sir, it may be very wrong to give subscriptions to election funds at all, but is there any one gentleman opposite who will say he has not expended money himself, or has been aided in doing so by his friends. (Several members of the opposition here denied the charge.) Whether those acts had been done by the members themselves or their friends, money was spent and always would be spent on elections. I don't hesitate to say—and I state this in the face of this house, of the country, and of the world—that I am not aware of any one single farthing having been spent illegitimately and contrary to law (opposition laughter and cheers)—by members on the government side of the house. I can tell of one man on the other side who spent $26,000; another case I can prove of spending $30,000, and I can also prove cases of spending $5,000, $6,000, $7,000, and $8,000, and when the committee which the hon. member for Bothwell challenged me to move, and which I intend to move, is appointed, I shall give the proofs. (Laughter, in which Mr. Blain joined.) I can prove the expenditure of money by that gentleman (Mr. Blain) himself.

MR. BLAIN—If the right hon. gentleman refers to me, I say there is not a particle of truth in the statement. Not one single, solitary cent came out of my pocket unfairly. (Cheers and laughter.)

SIR JOHN MACDONALD—Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not a pocket. Perhaps his wife has. (Laughter, and cries of “shame” from the opposition.)

Mr. BLAIN rose. (Cries of "order.") He said the right hon. gentleman had made a charge against him. He would answer it at another time.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—Before the committee which I propose to move, and which will have the power to administer an oath, and which the member for Bothwell has invited, I shall be able to prove the fact I stated. The hon. gentleman will perhaps reserve himself for that. (Interruption.)

Mr. HOLTON—I raise the question of order. I doubt whether the right hon. gentleman is in order in making statements affecting the right of hon. gentlemen to sit in this house without formulating charges to be followed by a motion. The hon. gentleman intimates his intention of making a motion at a future time, but he cannot move a motion of the kind indicated in a debate on the address. To charge members with having obtained their seats by improper means is therefore a violation of the proprieties of debate, and I believe of other standing orders of the house.

Mr. BLAKE—In the case of the member for West York the proceeding is doubly irregular, for it is interfering with an actual petition pending before an election committee.

The SPEAKER said a good deal of language had been used during the debate which would have been better not used, but the subject was of such a character that he should not interfere with free discussion. It would be better if the minister of justice refrained from directing charges against individual members.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—I submit to your decision, sir, I would not have alluded to the hon. member if it had not been for the offensive way in which he interrupted me, and my knowledge about his case. The hon. gentlemen opposite will find out that I know a great deal more about their elections than they would care that I should know. I shall now proceed with the history I am giving to the house as well as I can under these unseemly interruptions. Sir, there never was an occasion, there never was a minute, in which the interests of Canada were sacrificed by the government of Canada for election purposes. (Loud cheers.) I say that we carry out the law as well as the law can be carried out. (Cheers.) I say that up to the very last moment we tried to obtain an amalgamation of the two companies. I almost went on my knees, which is not my habit, I am sorry to say, to my friends in Toronto, for the purpose of securing an amalgamation, and though I did not secure an amalgamation of the two companies, yet I got an amalgamation of the two interests, and secured the best men in western Canada. I have no hesitation in saying that in the company chartered by the government, we have the very best men in Canada, considering all the circumstances. Let us go over the whole board from Upper Canada. There is Mr. Donald McInnes, of Hamilton, I will ask the hon. member for Welland if he is not a merchant of standing and respectability, and one of the last men to sell the interests of the Dominion to the Yankees. I asked the Hon. Mr. Carling to come on the board, but when the house came to the conclusion to exclude members of parliament from that board, I obtained Major Walker, representing one of the leading industrials in the west. Then there is Col. Cumberland, and can we suppose that Col. Cumberland, who is at the head of the great railway interests, and is charged with the management of millions of dollars, would sell himself to Sir Hugh Allan or the Yankees. (Cheers.) I asked Mr. Fleming, the engineer, the man whose name will live on this continent for his great engineering exploits, and who was objected to with Col. Cumberland and Major Walker by Sir Hugh Allan. Then the last man I asked was Mr. Walter Shanly. To some of you Walter Shanly may be unknown, but in the old provinces of Canada he is everywhere known as being most highly respected, and as an engineer, the man who formerly managed the Grand Trunk, the man who achieved the great triumph of constructing the Hoosac Tunnel. I asked him as a personal friend of mine, as an old Ontarian, as one who was representing a wealthy constituency, to come on that board, and much against his will he came. In the same way let us look at the lower province members. We look at Mr. E. R. Burpee. That is a truly honoured name, I am told, in New Brunswick. Do you think that E. R. Burpee is going to sell to the Yankees, Jay Cooke, & Co., or to the member for Shefford? (Laughter and cheers.) Then we come to Lieut.-governor Archibald, of Nova Scotia, and is he likely to sell us to the Yankees, the member for Shefford, or Jay Cooke & Co.? I appeal to all the members for British Columbia, some of whom were opposed to him in politics, whether the name of Dr. Helmcken did not inspire respect. (Cheers.) With respect to Manitoba, I will only ask you to say whether Mr. McDermott, the richest and oldest merchant in Manitoba, a man who was the last who would sell the interest of this great Dominion to the Yankees, whether that man would sell Canada. If ever any government succeeded in accomplishing any particular object, surely this government tried, and succeeded, to prevent foreigners from obtaining influence in, or control over, our trans-continental railway. (Cheers.) By their line of action, the gentlemen opposite have postponed for some years the building of that railway, and they have besmirched unjustly, dishonourably, the character of the Canadian government and of the Canadian people. (Cheers.) If there be any delay, any postponement in the completion of that great system of railways, I charge it to the hon. gentlemen opposite. (Cheers.) Long after this quarrel is over, it will be recorded in the history of this Dominion of Canada that there was one body of men in this country willing to forget self, to forget party, to forget section, to build up a great interest and make a great country, and they will say there was another party who fought section against section, province against province, who were unable to rise to the true position of affairs, and I say the history of the future will be our justification, and their condemnation. (Loud cheers.) But, sir, I have some more to say. I say this government has been treated with foul wrongs. (Cheers.) I say this government has been treated as no government has ever been treated before. It has been met with an opposition the like of which no government in any civilized country was ever met. (Loud cheers.) I say we have been opposed not with fair weapons, not by fair argument, not by fair discussion, as a government ought to be opposed, but opposed in a manner which will throw shame on hon. gentlemen opposite. (Renewed cheers.) When we first met in this house, and we first discussed these Pacific railway measures, I told you, sir, that there was a confirmed plot to kill the Pacific railway company. The attack on the government was a secondary matter. It was a comparatively inferior matter. But those gentlemen opposite went into the attack for the purpose of getting in evidence as quickly as possible for the purpose of sending it across the Atlantic by cable and kill Sir Hugh Allan's enterprise, and afterwards leave the proof of the evidence to chance. Then we found that Sir Hugh Allan, by a very natural feeling agreed to pay a certain sum of money to Mr. McMullen for the return of his correspondence, which was accepted, and the whole matter was arranged. Then blackmail was attempted to be levied on me, but I was not subject to be blackmailed. (Laughter.) They did levy blackmail on Sir Hugh Allan in Montreal, and McMullen for surrendering his letters to Sir Hugh, was paid $20,000, and was promised $17,000 more on certain conditions being fulfilled. McMullen got his extra sum from some one. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Huntington) would deny that Mr. McMullen was paid by some one. Everyone will believe that the man who was to be paid that large sum of $17,000 did not accept it because he was offered some larger sums. (Cheers.) I believe that when we have the committee which the member for Bothwell challenged to move for, I shall be able to prove more than the $17,000, and I believe I shall be able to prove there were other parties in the purchase of G. W. McMullen, who over-bid Sir Hugh Allan. (Cheers and an opposition member, "is it not right?") It was never right to buy him in the first place, nor in the second place, but if Sir Hugh Allan by paying $17,000 committed a crime, the man who paid him a larger sum must surely have committed a larger crime. (Laughter and cheers.) I say that you must have a committee in order to ascertain who are the gentlemen who went and deliberately bought those documents from Sir Hugh Allan. That may be fair war, but some one said it was striking below the belt. The man who goes deliberately and bribes people to hand a man's private letters, is a man who will be marked as a criminal all his life, and the man who goes and deliberately purchases private letters for any purpose, even though it may do good to the public, and expose a corrupt government, will be generally condemned. Then we come down to a little more infamy. When I tell you that a letter of mine, addressed to a colleague at Montreal, was deliberately stolen, and when I tell you there is no doubt that it was stolen because it was thought to contain something that could be made politically useful, you can understand what infamy that is.

Mr. BLAIN rose to a point of order, and submitted that this question was not before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled against him stating that it came on the address, which covered all grounds.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—When I wrote that letter to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, I sent, at the same time, three telegrams to three different places, and that telegram was seen by some one acting in the interests of the Opposition, and from it they supposed that the letter would be connected with the Pacific railway matter. That letter was deliberately stolen, not only stolen but was stolen by an officer of the Post Office Department. I say stolen by an officer who was bought by some one, and who will some day, not long distant, for the evidence is being followed up and has not been abandoned, be found out, and it will be shown that he, believing that the letter contained something that would criminate the government, stole it from the office and handed it over to be used in the manner the house was aware of. True it was that the letter contained nothing respecting the Pacific railroad. I have got evidence beyond the possibility of a doubt, that my telegrams were stolen from Sir Hugh Allan's office, day after day; that a man went to the office night after night, after six o'clock, and copied those telegrams, and brought them down and sold them to the opposition; that the safe of the office was not broken, and that after the documents were copied and sworn to by the man, he was paid money for them. I state this in presence of the house and of the country; and there was such a dishonest system of espionage carried on. And I say more than this, I join with the hon. member for Bothwell in asking for the committee, before which I will prove all that I have said, and will put a credible witness in the box, who will swear he saw it with his own eyes. You can judge how poorly the government has been treated. In fact no government in the world could exist if every drawer is to be searched, if every confidential servant is to be bribed by money offered to them. I may tell you this one thing, that I had got the evidence of this treachery, parties actually approached a secretary in Mr. Abbott's office, and offered him money to tell how much evidence had been obtained. Mr. Abbott is present in the house and will attest the truth of what I state. I can prove that from the beginning to the end of this business, there was never a more gross system of espionage, of corruption, of bribing men to steal papers from their employers; and I would ask how any opposition or party in this country could stand under such an accusation if it be proved. Sir, before I sit down I will touch upon one point to which I have not yet adverted, and that is how far a government, or member of a government may concern themselves in elections, and the necessary expenditure or supposed expenditure of money at elections. I would wish to point out what has taken place in England, not under the old régime, but by the reform party in England. It is of some importance, as showing at all events that for everything I have got good authority. The house well remembers the great struggle, almost amounting to a revolution, which accompanied the passage of the Reform bill in England. Well, Mr. Speaker, strange to say, the reform party there, who were going to purify the political atmosphere, those who were going to put down the old borough-mongers, did not hesitate to spend money at elections. They did not trust to the excellence of their measures, to the justness of their cause, and the consequence was that before the date of the Carlton club and the Reform club, of which so much has recently been said, the Reform party had a treasurer, and whom do you think they gave the office to? It was to the maker and unmaker of Whiggery, Edward Ellice. Now, Edward Ellice was the man who made the Whig government. He was a member of the government and acted as whipper-in of the party, and was the man ordinarily employed in making arrangements about elections. But Edward Ellice was a man incapable of doing anything which he did not think he was justified in doing. Any man who knew that right hon. gentleman, who knew what a great influence he had on the history of his country, would know that Edward Ellice was perhaps a greater man for pulling the strings and making arrangements for reform than even Lord John Russell himself. Let me tell you a little story about him. In my boyhood, when I knew him, he often told me stories of this sort. In 1834 there happened to be a committee on the inns of court. Mr. Daniel O'Connell was the chairman, and it came out in that investigation, which involved the seat of a member of parliament, that Lord Westham had got five hundred pounds from Mr. Ellice, the secretary of the treasury, in order to carry the Liberal candidate. O'Connell felt it his bounden duty to report this matter to the house, and there was a motion of censure moved against Mr. Ellice by Mr. O'Connell. Mr. Ellice resigned his place, and I shall read you what he said. At the time he made that speech he was secretary of war; at the time he expended the money he was secretary of the treasury. He was an important man to the government, and might have been a cabinet minister, had it not been that, as every one who knew the history of those times knew, he would not take that position. He was the man who arranged matters for the whigs, and he was charged with having used the secret service money in elections, as by the way, I was a short time ago. The right hon. gentleman then quoted from Mr. Ellice's speech, volume 27, "Mirror of Parliament," and now, said he, I will quote from Sir Charles Buller. Sir Charles Buller was the head and front of the philosophical radicals of England. They formed a party of their own, and tried to engraft their principles on the politics of England, and, although they did not succeed, they sowed good seed, the results of which are seen at the present day. I, who was a boy, remember him, and remember the kindness with which he discussed politics with me, and I am certain that he would have sustained the cause of the liberal party by nothing that was wrong. The right hon. gentleman quoted from the speech referred to. The attack was made upon Mr. Ellice that he had spent money out of the secret service fund; but when Mr. Ellice rose and said that he had spent no money out of the secret service fund, and that although very large sums of money had passed through his hands for election purposes, none of it had been improperly procured, the house passed on without taking any action, though Mr. O'Connell supported the motion with all his great eloquence and ability. A remark has been made in the newspapers that on one occasion I stated that no money had been expended by the government on elections, and in answer to the charge I asked Mr. Kidd, on the hustings at South Perth, whether any money had been expended at his election, and he said no, no statement could have been truer. Sir, the money that was expended by the committee, of which I was a member, was not with the purpose or object of endangering any man's seat. (Ironical cheers from the opposition, and cheers from the ministerial benches.) I state distinctly, so far as I know, not one single farthing that passed through my hands was expended improperly or contrary to the law. If it is so, the election tribunals of the country will settle that question, and, as I understand it, no improper expenditure has been proved in any election tribunal. (Cheers.) I say distinctly, say it in my place as a member of parliament, that money was distributed for the purpose of fighting money against money, fire against fire, influence against influence; and we were over-matched by the hon. gentlemen opposite. (Loud cheers.) There is one more remark that I have to make before I sit down. The government never gave Sir Hugh Allan any contract that I am aware of. (Cheers.) We never gave him any contract in which he had a controlling influence. We had formed a committee of thirteen men, chosen carefully and painfully, for the purpose of controlling Sir Hugh Allan from having any undue influence. We promised, we provided, that not one of the board should hold more than one hundred thousand dollars of the stock; that not one single man should have any interest in the contract whatever, which were of course, only the ordinary provisions in a charter of incorporation. (Cheers.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only one more thing to say on this point. I put it to your own minds. There were thirteen gentlemen—Sir Hugh Allan and others—incorporated by that charter. That charter—study it, take it home with you. Is there any single power, privilege or advantage given to Sir Hugh Allan with that contract that has not been given equally to the other twelve? (Cheers.) It is not pretended that any of the other twelve paid money for their positions. It is not contended that the gentlemen gave anything further than their own personal feelings might dictate. (Cheers.) You cannot name a man of these thirteen that has got any advantage over the other, except that Sir Hugh Allan has his name down first on the paper. (Cheers.) Can any one believe that the government is guilty of the charges made against them? I call upon any one who does to read that charter. Is there anything in that contract? If there is a word in that charter which derogates from the rights of Canada; if there is any undue privilege, or right, or preponderance, given to any one of these thirteen directors, I say, Mr. Speaker, I am condemned. But, sir, I commit myself, the government commits itself, to the hands of this house; and far beyond the house, it commits itself to the country at large. (Loud cheers.) We have faithfully done our duty. We have fought the battle of confederation. We have fought the battle of union. We have had party strife setting province against province; and more than all, we have had in the greatest province, the preponderating province of the Dominion, every prejudice and sectional feeling that could be arrayed against us. I have been the victim of that conduct to a great extent; but I have fought the battle of confederation, the battle of union, the battle of the Dominion of Canada. I throw myself upon this house; I throw myself upon this country; I throw myself upon posterity; and I believe that I know, that, notwithstanding the many failings in my life, I shall have the voice of this country, and this house, rallying around me. (Cheers.) And, sir, if I am mistaken in that, I can confidently appeal to a higher court—to the court of my own conscience, and to the court of posterity.

(Cheers.) I leave it with this house with every confidence. I am equal to either fortune. I can see past the decision of this house, either for or against me; but whether it be for or against me, I know—and it is no vain boast for me to say so, for even my enemies will admit that I am no boaster—that there does not exist in Canada a man who has given more of his time, more of his heart, more of his wealth, or more of his intellect and power, such as they may be, for the good of this Dominion of Canada.
